

Highlights

- Eating capability (EC) of 30 elderlies was measured using non-invasive techniques
- Eating of food and gels of different texture was video-recorded and analysed
- The EC scores did not correlate with oral residence time or difficulty perceived
- Number of chews and time at mouth were higher for edentulous participants.
- Beside hardness, degree of food structure influences oral processing behaviour