

This is a repository copy of Women's history in many places::reflections on plurality, diversity and polyversality.

White Rose Research Online URL for this paper:

<https://eprints.whiterose.ac.uk/id/eprint/110969/>

Version: Accepted Version

Article:

de Groot, Joanna orcid.org/0000-0002-8997-9811 (2016) Women's history in many places::reflections on plurality, diversity and polyversality. Women's History Review. pp. 1-12. ISSN: 1747-583X

<https://doi.org/10.1080/09612025.2016.1250528>

Reuse

Items deposited in White Rose Research Online are protected by copyright, with all rights reserved unless indicated otherwise. They may be downloaded and/or printed for private study, or other acts as permitted by national copyright laws. The publisher or other rights holders may allow further reproduction and re-use of the full text version. This is indicated by the licence information on the White Rose Research Online record for the item.

Takedown

If you consider content in White Rose Research Online to be in breach of UK law, please notify us by emailing eprints@whiterose.ac.uk including the URL of the record and the reason for the withdrawal request.

Women's History in Many Places: reflections on plurality, diversity and polyversality

Joanna de Groot

To cite this article: Joanna de Groot (2016): Women's History in Many Places: reflections on plurality, diversity and polyversality, Women's History Review, DOI: 10.1080/09612025.2016.1250528

To link to this article: <http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/09612025.2016.1250528>

Published online: 21 Nov 2016.

Submit your article to this journal ↗

View related articles ↗

View Crossmark data ↗

Women's History in Many Places: reflections on plurality, diversity and polyversality

Joanna de Groot

History Department, University of York, UK

ABSTRACT

This piece addresses the key questions posed by Chen Yan and Karen Offen in their joint position paper on the current state of women's history and its place at the cutting edge of historical practice. Having made the case that women's and gender history has had a significant and multi-level impact (empirical, conceptual, methodological and theoretical) on that practice, my article observes that acknowledgement of this is still very limited among those not centrally involved in the field. It notes the tensions between the aspiration both to identify and pursue women's and gender history as discrete fields of scholarly endeavour and the aspiration for women and gender to be treated as topics/categories which should be constitutive of all historical inquiry. It goes on to consider the relationship of women's history to gender history, to post-colonial and cross-cultural scholarship, and to recent work in spatial histories. It argues that in the first case the two approaches are mutually reinforcing, and that in the other two cases women's and gender history has been at the leading edge of these developing fields and is uniquely positioned to make innovative contributions there. The capacity of women's and gender history to continue as a leading edge area of historical practice will be grounded in its ongoing commitment to reflexivity about problems and limitations in the field, and to sustaining its key insights into the links between the personal and the structural, the global and the local, and the material and the cultural.

My contribution to the discussion opened up by Karen Offen and Chen Yan draws on my own experience as a historian of women, genders, feminisms and sexualities with particular interests in the Middle East, especially Iran, since c.1750, and in histories of empire since c.1700. It also draws on my involvement with comparative history, with interdisciplinary women's studies, and with the study of the concepts, methods and theories that sustain historical practice, which has taken me beyond the chronological and geographical confines of my other work. My experience is shaped by my membership of a generation who developed as historians in the UK through the 'history from below' revival of social history in the 1960s and 1970s, the 'cultural turn' of the 1980s and 1990s, and the more recent postcolonial turn.¹ This piece responds to the questions addressed in the main position paper, with particular reference to cross-cultural, trans-national, and post-colonial themes and approaches. It refers to work published or translated into English, but is fully appreciative of important work on the history of women and gender which has appeared in various languages from the work of Chinese, Japanese and Turkish scholars, to histories of women and gender in Europe and Latin America written in indigenous languages.

This analysis of the achievements of women's history over recent decades identifies three crucial and demonstrable levels of impact. At the substantive level existing scholarly practice has been modified by the recuperation of ignored or marginalized ideas and information regarding women and gender for use in historical research and writing. The study of ancient slavery or modern labour movements, like accounts of religious practice or monarchical governance, has been transformed by work based on evidence about the distinctive roles and perceptions of women, men, families, and sexualities.² At the conceptual level such information has led to a rethinking of terms regularly used by historians to depict and comment on past societies. Notions of 'work', 'politics', 'nation', 'family' and 'religion', to name just a few concepts regularly used in historical writing, acquire changed meanings once that evidence is taken into account.³ At the level of general analysis the 'big stories' of, say, the making of western European Christianity, conversion in nineteenth-century Africa, or nineteenth- and twentieth-century 'industrialisations' and modern politics are also transformed once due attention is given to the gendered character of production, governance, or culture.⁴ Moreover, from an early stage in its development, work in women's history has challenged the underpinning structures and intellectual tools of modern historical practice, including basic assumptions about periodisation and organising concepts, and continues to do so. The arguments of Kelly on notions of a 'Renaissance', and Walby on patriarchy, or of Clark on the history of Christianity and Anagol on Indian history illustrate the challenges and contributions.

Beyond these three levels, the work of scholars aware of women and gender in a range of disciplines has generated concepts and theoretical insights with potential to transform the whole field of historical practice. These include analyses of patriarchies and sexualities as conceptual categories useful to historians as well as socio-political structures which have shaped human existence in different times and cultures, the conceptualisation of men as gendered subjects, and the development of queer and postcolonial theory. Deconstructive strategies for approaching material from various periods and places, alongside woman-centred critiques of categories like 'experience' challenge many of the assumptions behind conventional social and political history.⁵ Like Karen Offen, I do not regard the development of 'gender' as a category or question for historical analysis as diminishing the need for, and relevance of, the question or category 'women.' Rather, I would suggest that (1) women's history has provided the conceptual and empirical stimulus for the relational approach from which gender theory has emerged, and (2) since that emergence the two ideas have had a fruitful if fraught relationship. It is important to note here how Anglophone historians of women have initiated important theoretical and conceptual developments in social and cultural theory rather than just responding to, or adapting, existing thinking. Bradford's studies of gender, race, and capitalism in South Africa, or Sinha's development of the notion of 'imperial social formation', like Najmabadi's work on modernity and hetero-normativity in Iran, exemplify innovative conceptual/theoretical work on the past solidly grounded in women's and gender history.⁶

It can thus be argued that the achievements of women's history range from the production of important studies of specific situations in the past, to the enhancement of historians' conceptual and methodological toolkits, and the creation of new analytical and theoretical frameworks.

Turning to the second question, I would suggest that what has not been achieved is the mainstreaming of either the empirical or the conceptual and methodological contributions made by women's history to historical scholarship over the last few decades. It is certainly possible to identify the impact of work in women's history through citations of that work, and through more frequent reference to women as part of the past which historians investigate. It is less easy to argue that the mindset or practices of historians in general have been significantly modified, or that women's history has a normal or guaranteed place in history curricula, or in general and survey texts on the history of particular periods, places or themes. Returning to the three levels used earlier to evaluate the impact of women's history, practitioners have been willing to acknowledge the recuperative work of women's history but have proven far more resistant to the conceptual and analytical implications of that work for all historical narratives and interpretations. Insofar as it is recognised, women's history is most often treated as an acceptable specific specialist field or interest for those historians who choose to pursue it, rather than as a constitutive element within historical practice which ought to inform any investigation or interpretation of the past. Insofar as that is not the case, it is more likely that women's role in any past society will get some degree of rather unspecific recognition from those who identify as 'social historians', and from some cultural historians. Mainstream economic histories are still unlikely to incorporate analyses of the care and maintenance work done mainly by women in families and households in their approaches to the history of work and production, commerce and consumption.

Much historical scholarship dealing with government, 'high politics', or political movements, has not found it necessary even to consider the forms and perceptions of women's inclusion or exclusion from these areas, let alone foreground it. Indeed, one eminent historian of modern Iran, himself the author of insightful analyses of the social bases of political change there, reacted publicly and angrily to suggestions that women could and should be incorporated within such analyses, arguing that attempts to do so collapse into mere social description.⁷ Practitioners in the field of intellectual history have been similarly reluctant to give due attention either to issues of women and gender or to women's roles as intellectuals in the past. Turning to an area in which I work, despite the leading edge scholarship on women and empire, mainstream histories and conceptualisations of empire are still written without incorporating consideration of women's involvement either as colonial subjects, or as agents of colonial power.⁸

It would be useful to undertake thorough research into possible explanations for the disparity between the manifest quantity and quality of work in women's history and the limited extent of its acknowledgement, let alone use, in the wider domains of historical practice. There are interesting paradoxes to consider here, since there are obvious tensions between the aspiration to integrate women's history at the core of all historical practice and the aspiration to ensure full recognition and analysis of the particularities of women's activities and experiences in past societies. To make particular people or issues visible is of course to identify them as specific topics for historical research, writing or teaching, and hence to separate them out for such purposes. Nonetheless it is important to make the case that one important use for such separate historical studies of women should be to inform the overall perspectives taken by historians on, say, sixteenth-century Ottoman religion, twentieth-century Italian political movements, medieval urban life, or ancient Roman slavery. Historical practice as a whole benefits most when there are practitioners who investigate and interpret women's past lives and activities as a distinctive field, and when their work is properly recognised by other practitioners in the shaping of their own particular projects and interests. The real mark of healthy influence is when there are historical conversations both among those who work on women's history (now a rich historiography) and also between such practitioners and those who take other approaches to the past (still a very limited historiography). Whether in the form of proper consideration of women's history in work centred on other themes, or the appearance of articles on women's history in journals other than those which specialise in that field, such crossovers and conversations are to be encouraged.⁹

Turning to the third question, I would argue that the heat and dust raised by the controversies which posed 'women's history' against 'gender history' a decade ago has now died down somewhat, and that this is a good thing. After critical reactions to the possibility that 'gender history' might once more conceal women whose lives and activities practitioners of women's history have made so much effort to make visible, explore and explain, more considered reflection suggests that the two approaches can be mutually reinforcing rather than mutually exclusive alternatives. The growth of historical scholarship which deals with men as gendered persons has become possible largely as a result of woman-centred, feminist, and queer research and theory that explore and conceptualise gender and sexuality as constitutive elements of human societies past and present. More specifically, one of the strengths of women's history is that it both identifies the differences and specificities of women's past lives and activities, and positions such specificities in relation to the lives and activities of men. Indeed it might be said that the very notion of 'difference' entails specifically relational uses of the category 'women', just as the notion of women's historical agency entails consideration of their interactions with men. From the analysis of industrialisation and monarchy, to histories of religion or colonial masculinity, scholarship in women's history embodies this relational and interactive approach.

A few examples from recent Anglophone scholarship on various parts of the world will illustrate this point. Leslie Peirce's path-breaking study of the women of the Ottoman court in the early modern period considers the wives, mothers, daughters and sisters of Ottoman rulers as political actors, as cultural patrons and as dynastic players.¹⁰ It analyses royal women's exercise of these roles and their powerful agency, positioning them in relation to male relatives and court or government officials, and analysing the specificities of their position within the Ottoman elite from that relational and interactive perspective. Mrinalini Sinha's elaboration of the concept of the 'imperial social formation', which has reconstituted studies of relationships between metropolises and colonies, is also underpinned by an emphasis on the distinctive and interactive roles of men and women within that formation.¹¹ She explores how the dynamics of empire are articulated through differences and intersections of race and gender created through the distinctive agency of men and women. Deborah Valenze's study of women and industrialisation in nineteenth-century England, like Davidoff and Hall's foundational work, advances the study of women by situating them analytically as well as empirically in families, classes and communities shaped by difference and interdependence, as well as by women's distinctive experiences. Their works parallels that of Gullickson on France, Friedl on Iran, or Moitt on Antillean slavery and many more socio-political studies of women.¹² Shula Marks' analysis of relationships between a young Zulu woman, a female English Fabian educator and an African woman social worker in 1940s South Africa uses comparable strategies. It unpacks the gendered, classed and racialised interactions of these three women with one another and with the sphere of male-dominated medical and political authority, exploring the realities and limitations of their agency. Another example would be Catherine Hall's subtle and authoritative exploration of the dynamics of racialised colonialism, and gendered religious endeavour in relationships linking England and the Caribbean in the nineteenth century.¹³

My comments quite consciously include illustrations taken from a range of very diverse societies, many of which have been part of the unequal global structures of material, political, and cultural power which have shaped the world since the sixteenth century. They are my point of entry into a discussion of the fourth question about the significance of recent developments in post-colonial, imperial and cross-cultural history for the practice of women's and gender history. As noted earlier, scholars like Sinha, Najmabadi, Kandiyoti and Mohanty have been the pioneers of path-breaking conceptual and methodological work in those fields, drawing on their work in women's history and reconfiguring the fields to which they contribute.¹⁴ This work faces in two directions, challenging the ethnocentrism of some women's history while also interrogating the neglect of women in, and gender blindness of, much work on empire and race. For feminist practitioners of women's history who had focused on the disadvantaged, exploited, unequal and disempowered position of women in western Europe and North America it has been challenging to confront histories of white women's racial and colonial power and privilege. However, that confrontation has proved to be productive as well as challenging, as seen in the critical engagement of Boydston or Najmabadi with Joan Scott's canonical discussion of gender as a category of historical analysis, or the work of Fox-Genovese and Beckles on slavery.¹⁵ Practitioners of women's history can draw on their experience of relational and interactive approaches to the category 'women', deployed since the 1980s to address the complex interactions of gender and class in women's lives, in order to be equally attentive to women's varied positioning in colonial and racial hierarchies. From Clare Midgely's interrogations of women and empire to Few and Socilow's work on Latin America, or Antoinette Burton's sophisticated studies of the British raj in India there is ample evidence of the capacity of women's history for creative adaptation to the challenge of ethnocentrism.¹⁶ There is no cause to be complacent about this issue, since ethnocentrism is a comfort zone to which it is easy to retreat, but there is visible evidence of the possibility of change.

There have also been important developments in the discussion of concepts and methods to support work on specific topics. Although it can be argued that work on African-American women has privileged their racialised situation over that of other subordinated groups in the US, it has produced valuable empirical and theoretical insights relevant for historians of women in other gendered structures of colonial or racial subordination. In particular the development of the notion of intersectionality as an analytical tool, which originated in African-American feminist thought, has also been useful to scholars working on other societies, and on concepts or comparative studies of empire and nation.¹⁷ It allows scholars to research and analyse connections and tensions between different markers and relations of power and subordination without resorting to the construction of restrictive and un-illuminating hierarchies of oppression or exploitation. It aligns with studies of women in various African and Middle Eastern societies which analyse interactions between gender, status and age/lifecycle hierarchies, a topic also examined by a number of historians of medieval women. These hierarchies sustain relations of power and inequality whose presence significantly modifies ethnocentric western assumptions about the primacy of gender and class, and analyses of the operations of colonialism.¹⁸ The notion of intersectionality allows practitioners of women's history to sidestep sterile arguments about the relative force of different unequal power relations without simply retreating into descriptive empiricism.

Developments in theory and method, which is a more contentious matter for those trained in historical practices than for those whose formation has been in the social sciences, is nonetheless vital if women's history is to sustain a cutting and growing edge. It becomes even more so in a context where practitioners of women's history cannot ignore critiques of ethnocentrism and cultural imperialism. Serious cross-cultural and comparative work in our field, which allows us a fuller appreciation of specificity, as well as enabling more meaningful discussion of common themes or patterns, needs the support of clear thinking about the concepts and methods which will be most relevant to that work. Knowing which ideas and analyses are 'good to think with' is an essential component of effective and discriminating women's history in the era of post-colonial thought and the recent 'provincialising' of histories of Europe and North America. In view of the marginalisation of women and gender perspectives in key texts on this theme, interventions which position those perspectives more centrally will be vital for the credibility of this scholarship.¹⁹ It would diminish the potential for what could be a creative development in current historiography if older patterns of blindness and bias are replicated. For those historians who are wary of engagement with theory it is interesting to look at the arguments of Zillah Eisenstein for the notion of what she calls 'polyversality'.²⁰ While she undoubtedly develops a distinctive concept to aid the cross-cultural discussion of women, she grounds her work in reflections on actual history and politics, and on the need for general analyses of global patriarchies to incorporate understanding of the colonial past and on global socio-cultural diversity.

Discussion of the significance of the relevance of recent developments in imperial history and cross cultural comparison for women's history opens up the question of spaces, and networks, referred to by our final question. Imperial historians have developed an interest in the constitutive role within the imperial social formation of people's movements through 'imperial space' as migrants, missionaries, convicts, settlers and slaves, within which there is important specific work on female members of all these groups.²¹ If women's history has gained by engaging with this strand in global history, it likewise has its own specific resources to offer to the making of spatial histories. One of the foundational areas in women's history has been recognition of the key role of spaces of all kinds in the construction of female/male relationships and differences. From critical engagement with Habermas's gender-blind conceptualisation of the public sphere (or space as it is named in French) to close studies of women in relation to household, community and other spaces, practitioners of women's history have done creative work in this area.²² They have explored and analysed the spatial dynamics of women's roles in consumption, in faith practices, in leisure and entertainment, and as cultural and intellectual practitioners in societies across the globe. This work has deepened our understanding of the gendered character of the making of, and movement through, space in different cultures and periods and of spatial aspects shaping the activities of women as performers, activists, philanthropists, sex workers, believers and authors or artists.²³ The recent special issue of the journal Gender and History on the theme of 'men at home', despite its title, reveals the importance of women's history in the development of spatial histories. Covering situations ranging from modern Iran to late medieval Italy by way of Mozambique and US plantation slavery, the articles in the issue demonstrate the contribution of women's history to histories of gender, space and socio-cultural change.²⁴

Indeed, one of the exciting and inspiring aspects of women's and gender history, in Anglophone scholarship and elsewhere, is its capacity to move between the dynamics of the intimate and biographical and those of the global and trans-national. The origins of these histories in strong awareness of various forms of female difference and agency has underpinned a powerful practice of studying the presence of the global in the household, of the familial in the imperial, and of the personal in political contexts small and large. Women's and gender history has also demonstrated the capacity to respond to the challenge of studying women across time and space by extending its conceptual and methodological as well as its empirical range. In the process practitioners in the field have become leading-edge conceptual and methodological contributors and innovators. While it is important to avoid complacency and to recognise the limitations and problematic aspects of our practice as historians of women and gender, we should have the confidence and the self-reflective perceptiveness to work constructively on our limitations and problems. It is on that basis that the practice of women's history can remain at the cutting edge.

Notes

1. An interesting take on the experiences of that generation is provided by G. Eley (2005) A Crooked Line: from cultural history to the history of society (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press), which gives serious consideration to the role of women's and gender history.
2. E.g. R. Lal (2005) Domesticity and Power in the Early Mughal World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press); B. Bush (1990) Slave Women in Caribbean Society 1650–1838 (Bloomington: Indiana University Press); C. Bynum (1987) Holy Feast and Holy Fast: the significance of food to medieval women (Berkeley: University of California Press); B. Hanawalt (1988) Women and Work in Pre-industrial Europe (Bloomington: Indiana University Press); J. Scott & L. Tilly (1978) Women, Work, and Family (New York: Holt Rinehart); L. Davidoff & C. Hall (1987) Family Fortunes (London: Hutchinson); I. Silverblatt, (1987) Moon, Sun, and Witches: gender ideologies and class in Inca and colonial Peru (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press).
3. D. Elson (1999) Labor Markets as Gendered Institutions: equality, efficiency and empowerment issues, World Development, 27 (3), pp. 611–627; A. Phillips & B. Taylor (1980) Sex and Skill: notes towards a feminist economics, Feminist Review, 6 (1), pp. 79–88; H. Applewhite & D. Levy (1993) Women and Politics in the Age of the Democratic Revolution (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press); J. Nelson (2007) Courts, Elites, and Gendered Power in the Early Middle Ages: Charlemagne and others (Northampton, Variorum); S. Kettering (1989) The Patronage Power of Early Modern French Noblewomen, Historical Journal, 32 (4), pp. 817–841; J. McNamara & S. Wemple (1973) The Power of Women through the Family in Medieval Europe: 500–1100, Feminist Studies, 1 (3–4), pp. 126–141; I. Blom,

- K. Hagemann & C. Hall (Eds) (2000) Gendered Nations (Oxford: Berg); M. Tavakoli-Targhi (2002) From Patriotism to Matriotism: a tropological study of Iranian nationalism, 1870–1909, International Journal of Middle East Studies, 34 (2), pp. 217–238; A. Najmabadi (1996) 'Is Our Name Remembered?' Writing the history of Iranian constitutionalism as if gender mattered, Iranian Studies, 29 (1), pp. 85–109; C. Bynum (1984) Jesus as Mother (Berkeley: University of California Press); M. Kaplan & D. Moore (Eds) (2011) Gender and Jewish History (Bloomington: Indiana University Press); M. Baer (2004) Islamic Conversion Narratives of Women: social change and gendered religious hierarchy in early modern Ottoman Istanbul, Gender and History, 16 (2) pp. 425–458; J. de Groot and S. Morgan (Eds) (2014) Sex, Gender and the Sacred: reconfiguring gender history (Oxford: Wiley-Blackwell).
4. M. Erler & M. Kowaleski (Eds) (2003) Gendering the Master Narrative: women and power in the middle ages (Ithaca: Cornell University Press); A. Shepard & G. Walker (Eds.) (2008) Gender, Change and Periodisation, Gender and History, 20 (3) pp. 453–462; K. Honeyman (2000) Women, Gender, and Industrialization in England, 1700–1870 (London: Macmillan); S. Rose (1986) Gender at Work: sex, class and industrial capitalism, History Workshop Journal, 21 (1) pp. 113–132; K. Canning (1992) Gender and the Politics of Class Formation: rethinking German labor history, American Historical Review, 97(3), pp. 736–768; J. Scott (1988) Gender and the Politics of History (New York: Columbia University Press); J. Boydston (2008) Gender as a Question of Historical Analysis, Gender and History, 20 (3) pp. 558–583; S. Morgan (2005) Rethinking Religion in Gender History: theoretical & methodological reflections, in U. King & T. Beattie (Eds) Gender, Religion and Diversity (London: A&C Black), pp. 113–124; J de Groot & S. Morgan (2013) Beyond the 'Religious Turn'? Past, present and future perspectives in gender history, Gender and History, 25 (3), pp. 395–422; J. Kelly (1986) Did Women have a Renaissance?, in J. Kelly Women, History, and Theory (Chicago: University of Chicago Press); P. Anagol (2008) Agency, Periodisation and Change in the Gender and Women's History of Colonial India, Gender and History, 20 (3), pp. 603–627.
 5. For example, J. Scott (1992) Experience, in J. Butler & J. Scott (Eds) Feminists Theorise the Political (London: Routledge); E. Clark (1998) The Lady Vanishes: dilemmas of a feminist historian after the 'linguistic turn', Church History, 67 (1), pp. 1–31; S. Walby (1989) Theorising Patriarchy, Sociology, 23(2), pp. 213–234; A. Brah (1991) Difference, Diversity, Differentiation, International Review of Sociology, 2 (2), pp. 53–71; D. Kandiyoti (1988) Bargaining with Patriarchy, Gender & Society, 2 (3) pp. 274–290; S. Gruber & M. Szotysek (2016) The Patriarchy Index: a comparative study of power relations across historical Europe, History of the Family, 21 (2), pp 1–42; V. Patil (2013) From Patriarchy to Intersectionality: a transnational feminist assessment of how far we've really come, Signs, 38 (4) pp. 847–867.
 6. H. Bradford (1996) Women, Gender and Colonialism: rethinking the history of the British Cape Colony and its frontier zones, c.1806–70, Journal of African History, 37 (3) pp. 351–370; (2006) Peasants, Historians, and Gender: a South African case study revisited, 1850–1886, History and Theory, 39(4), pp. 86–110; also (1995) Women in the Cape and its Frontier Zones, 1800–1870: a critical essay on androcentric historiography, Proceedings of the Biannual South African Historical Society Conference; M. Sinha (2000) Mapping the Imperial Social Formation: a modest proposal for feminist history, Signs, 25 (4), pp. 1077–1082; (1997) Teaching Imperialism as a Social Formation, Radical History Review, 67, pp. 175–186; A. Najmabadi (2005) Women with Mustaches and Men without Beards (Berkeley: University of California Press); K. Babayan & A. Najmabadi (Eds) (2008) Islamicate Sexualities: translations across temporal geographies of desire (Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press).
 7. At a conference at which I was present.
 8. J. Osterhammel (1997) Colonialism: a theoretical overview (Princeton: Wiener); J. Osterhammel & N. Peterson (2005) Globalisation: a short history (Princeton: Princeton University Press); J. Burbank & F. Cooper (2011) Empires in World History (Princeton: Princeton University Press); M. Doyle (1986) Empires (Ithaca: Cornell University Press); F. Cooper (2005) Colonialism in Question (Berkeley: University of California Press); P. Cain & A. Hopkins (1993) British Imperialism 1688–1990 (London: Longman); P. Cain

- & M. Harrison (Eds) (2001) Imperialism: critical concepts in historical studies (London: Routledge); G. Eley (2010) Imperial Imaginary, Colonial Effect: writing the colony and the metropole together, in C. Hall & K. McLelland (Eds) (2010) Race, Nation and Empire: making histories from 1750 to the present (Manchester: Manchester University Press); J. Darwin (2009) The Empire Project: the rise and fall of the British world-system, 1830–1970 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press); (2008) After Tamerlane: the global history of empire since 1405 (London: Penguin). I myself deal with this more extensively in a forthcoming article entitled 'Beyond Bias, Blindness and Marginalisation: gender and the making/unmaking of colonial and postcolonial analyses', in S. Schmolinsky et al. (Eds) (forthcoming), Time-Space of the Imperial (Berlin: de Gruyters).
9. Kelly, 'Did Women have a Renaissance?'; Shepard & Walker, 'Gender, Change and Periodisation'; S. Walby (1990) From Private to Public Patriarchy: the periodisation of British history, Women's Studies International Forum, 13 (1), pp. 91–104; J. Morgan (2016) Periodization Problems: race and gender in the history of the early Republic, Journal of the Early Republic, 36 (2) pp. 351–357; E. Clark (2001) Women, Gender, and the Study of Christian History, Church History, 70 (3), pp. 395–426; Anagol, 'Agency, Periodisation and Change'.
 10. L. Peirce (1993) The Imperial Harem: women and sovereignty in the Ottoman empire (Oxford: Oxford University Press).
 11. M. Sinha (1995) Colonial Masculinity (Manchester: Manchester University Press); (1994) Reading Mother India: empire, nation, and the female voice, Journal of Women's History, 6 (2), pp. 6–44.
 12. D. Valenze (1996) The First Industrial Woman (Oxford: Oxford University Press); Davidoff & Hall, Family Fortunes; G. Gullickson (1986) Spinners and Weavers of Aulay: rural industry and the sexual division of labour (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press); E. Friedl (1991) The Dynamics of Women's Spheres of Action in Rural Iran, in N. Keddie & B. Baron (Eds) Women in Middle Eastern History: shifting boundaries in sex and gender (New Haven: Yale University Press); B. Moitt (2001) Women and Slavery in the French Antilles, 1635–1848 (Bloomington: Indiana University Press).
 13. S. Marks (1988) Not Either an Experimental Doll: the separate worlds of three South African women (Bloomington: Indiana University Press); C. Hall (2002) Civilising Subjects: metropole and colony in the English imagination 1830–67 (Cambridge: Polity Press).
 14. Sinha, 'Mapping the Imperial'; 'Reading Mother India'; D. Kandiyoti, Bargaining with Patriarchy; (1991) Islam and Patriarchy: a comparative perspective, in Keddie & Baron, Women in Middle Eastern History; also (2005) Rethinking Bargaining with Patriarchy in C. Jackson & R. Pearson (Eds) Feminist Visions of Development: gender analysis and policy (London: Routledge); A. Najmabadi (2004) From Supplementarity to Parasitism?, Journal of Women's History, 16 (2), pp. 30–35; (2006) Beyond the Americas: gender and sexuality as useful categories of analysis, Journal of Women's History, 18(1), pp. 11–21; C. Mohanty (1991) Cartographies of Struggle, and 'under western eyes', in C. Mohanty et al. (Eds) Third World Women and the Politics of Feminism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press).
 15. Boydston, 'Gender as a Question'; Najmabadi, 'Beyond the Americas'; E. Fox-Genovese (1988) Within the Plantation Household: black and white women of the old south (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press); H. Beckles (1999) Centering Women: gender relations in Caribbean slave society (Princeton: Martin Rieker); T. Burnard (2004) Mastery, Tyranny and Desire: Thomas Thistlewood and his slaves in the Anglo-Jamaican world (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press); M. Elgersman (2014) Unyielding Spirits: black women and slavery in early Canada and Jamaica (London: Routledge).
 16. C. Midgley (2007) Feminism and Empire: women activists in imperial Britain, 1790–1865 (London: Routledge); C. Midgley et al. (Eds) (2016) Women in Transnational History: connecting the local and the global (London: Routledge); S. Socolow (2015) The Women of Colonial Latin America (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press); M. Few (1995) Women, Religion, and Power: gender and resistance in daily life in late-seventeenth-century Santiago de Guatemala, Ethnohistory, 42 (4), pp. 627–637; A. Burton (1998) At the Heart of the Empire: Indians and the colonial encounter in late-Victorian Britain (Berkeley: University - of California Press); (2003) Dwelling in the Archive: women writing house, home, and history in late colonial India (Oxford: Oxford University Press).

17. Early discussions are K. Crenshaw (1991) Mapping the Margins: intersectionality, identity politics, and violence against women of color, Stanford Law Review, 43 (6), pp. 1241–1299; D. Hine (1992) Black Women's History, White Women's History: the juncture of race and class, Journal of Women's History, 4 (2), pp. 125–133; later views are found in L. McCall (2005) The Complexity of Intersectionality, Signs, 30 (3), pp. 771–800; J. Nash (2008) Re-thinking Intersectionality, Feminist Review, 89, pp. 1–15; see also Brah, 'Difference, Diversity, Differentiation'; A. Brah (2004) Ain't I A Woman? Revisiting intersectionality, Journal of International Women's Studies, 5 (3), pp. 53–71; Patil, 'From Patriarchy to Intersectionality'.
 18. Boydston, 'Gender as a Question'; Kandiyoti, 'Islam and Patriarchy'; O. Oyewùmí (2005) Visualizing the Body: western theories and African subjects, in O. Oyewùmí (Ed.) (2005) African Gender Studies: a reader (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan), pp. 3–21; The Invention of Women: making an African sense of western gender discourses (St Paul: University of Minnesota Press); see also B. Bakare-Yusef et al. (Eds) (2004) African Gender Scholarship: concepts, methodologies and paradigms (Oxford: Oxford University Press); P. J. Goldberg (1992) Women, Work and Lifecycle (Oxford: Oxford University Press); K. Phillips (2003) Medieval Maidens: young women and gender in England, c.1270–1540 (Manchester: Manchester University Press); K. Barclay et al. (2011) Introduction: Gender and Generations: women and life cycles, Women's History Review, 20 (2) pp. 175–188; P. Johnson & P. Thane (Eds) (2002) Old Age from Antiquity to Post-modernity (London: Routledge); A. Rowlands (2001) Witchcraft and Old Women in Early Modern Germany, Past and Present, 173, pp. 50–89.
 19. See D. Chakrabarty (2009) Provincializing Europe: postcolonial thought and historical difference (Princeton: Princeton University Press); (2016) Provincializing Medieval Europe: Mandeville's cosmopolitan utopianism, in K. Lochrie (Ed.) Nowhere in the Middle Ages (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press); A. Dirlik et al. (Eds) (2000) History after the Three Worlds: post-Eurocentric historiographies (Latham MD: Rowman & Littlefield); A. Dirlik (2013) Thinking Modernity Historically, Asian Review of World Histories, 1 (1), pp. 5–44; P. Gran (1996) Beyond Eurocentrism: a new view of modern world history (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press); S. Conrad (2012) Enlightenment in Global History: a historiographical critique, American Historical Review, 117 (4), pp. 999–1027; for comment see J. Zinsser (2013) 'Women's and Men's World History? Not yet, Journal of Women's History, 25 (4), pp. 309–318.
 20. Z. Eisenstein (2004) Against Empire: feminisms, racism and the 'west' (London: Zed Books), esp. pp. 34–46, 65–73, 96–101, 124–147, 181–226.
 21. R. Kranidis (1999) The Victorian Spinster and Colonial Emigration: contested subjects (London: Macmillan); J. Clancy-Smith (2005) Women, Gender and Migration along a Mediterranean Frontier: pre-colonial Tunisia, c. 1815–1870, Gender & History, 17 (1), pp. 62–92; J. Bush (1994) 'The Right Sort Of Woman': female emigrators and emigration to the British Empire, 1890–1910, Women's History Review, 3(3), pp. 385–409; J. Myers (2001) Performing the Voyage Out: Victorian female emigration and the class dynamics of displacement, Victorian Literature and Culture, 29 (1), pp. 129–146; L. Chilton (2003) A New Class of Women for the Colonies: the imperial colonist and the construction of empire, Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History, 31 (2), pp. 36–56; K. Ward (2009) Networks of Empire: forced migration in the Dutch East India Company (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press); M. Schrover (Ed.) (2008) Illegal Migration and Gender in a Global and Historical Perspective (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press); P. Williams (1999) Illegal Immigration and Commercial Sex: the new slave trade (Hove: Psychology Press); J. Moya (2007) Domestic Service in a Global Perspective: gender, migration, and ethnic niches, Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 33 (4), pp. 559–579; E. Zontini (2010) Transnational Families, Migration and Gender: Moroccan and Filipino women in Bologna and Barcelona (Oxford: Berghahn Books); A. Bertone (1999) Sexual Trafficking in Women: international political - economy and the politics of sex, Gender Issues, 18 (1), pp. 4–22; T. Bastia (2006) Stolen Lives or Lack of Rights? Gender, migration and trafficking, Labour, Capital and Society/Travail, capital et société, 39 (2), pp. 20–47; L. Shepherd (Ed.) (2014) Gender Matters in Global Politics: a feminist introduction to international relations (London: Routledge); R. Parreñas (2001) Servants of Globalization: women, migration and domestic work (Stanford: Stanford University Press); J. Andall (2000) Gender, Migration and Domestic Service (Farnham: Ashgate).

22. N. Fraser (1990) Rethinking the Public Sphere: a contribution to the critique of actually existing democracy, Social Text, 25–26, pp. 56–80; C. Calhoun (Ed.) (1992) Habermas and the Public Sphere (Boston: MIT Press); S. Maza (1992) Women, the Bourgeoisie, and the Public Sphere: response to Daniel Gordon and David Bell, French Historical Studies, 17 (2), pp. 935–950; N. Göle (1997) The Gendered Nature of the Public Sphere, Public Culture, 10 (1), pp. 61–81; J. Rendall (1999) Women and the Public Sphere, Gender & History, 11 (3), pp. 475–488.
 23. Examples include A. Firor Scott (1993) Natural Allies: women's associations in American history (Champaign: University of Illinois Press); B. Taylor (1983) Eve and the New Jerusalem (London: Virago Press); E. Rappaport (2001) Shopping for Pleasure: women in the making of London's West End (Princeton: Princeton University Press); M. Andrews & M. Talbot (Eds) (2000) All the World and Her Husband: women in 20th-century consumer culture (London: Bloomsbury); A. Bermingham & J. Brewer (2013) The Consumption of Culture (London: Routledge), chs 2, 3, 8, 9, 11; H. Hackel & C. Kelly (Eds) (2011) Reading Women: literacy, authorship, and culture in the Atlantic world, 1500–1800 (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press); E. Eger (2001) Women, Writing and the Public Sphere 1700–1830 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press); D. Willen (1988) Women in the Public Sphere in Early Modern England: the case of the urban working poor, Sixteenth Century Journal, 19 (4), pp. 559–575; A. Twells (2009) The Civilising Mission and the English Middle Class, 1792–1850 (London: Palgrave Macmillan); P. Brown & P. Parolin (Eds) (2008) Women Players in England 1500–1660: beyond the all-male stage (Farnham: Ashgate); J. Donawerth (2000) Poaching on Men's Philosophies of Rhetoric: eighteenth- and nineteenth-century rhetorical theory by women, Philosophy and Rhetoric, 33 (3), pp. 243–258; C. Jordan (2000) The Public Amateur and the Private Professional: a re-evaluation of the categories of public and private in colonial women artists' work, Australian and New Zealand Journal of Art, 1(2), pp. 42–60; E. Thompson (2003) Public and Private in Middle Eastern Women's History, Journal of Women's History, 15 (1) pp. 52–69.
 24. Gender and History, 27 (3), November 2015.

Notes on contributor

Joanna de Groot is a Senior Lecturer in the History Department at the University of York, UK. Her main academic interests are in gendered approaches to histories (a) of societies in the Middle East, especially Iran, since c.1800; (b) of imperial and colonial relationships and cultures since c.1700; (c) of historical practices and theories. Her most recent publications include Empire and History Writing in Britain 1750–2010 (Manchester UP, 2013), 'Hybridising Past, Present, and Future: reflections on the "sexology" of R. F. Burton', in K. Fisher and R. Langland (Eds) Sex, Knowledge and Receptions of the Past (Oxford UP, 2016), 'The Bureaucrat, the Mulla, and the Maverick Intellectual "At Home": domestic narratives of patriarchy, masculinity and modernity in Iran c.1880–1980', Gender and History, 27(3), (2015), pp. 791–811.