

This is a repository copy of Sex with Chinese Characteristics : Sexuality research in/on 21st century China.

White Rose Research Online URL for this paper:
<https://eprints.whiterose.ac.uk/127758/>

Version: Accepted Version

Article:

Jackson, Stephanie Forsythe orcid.org/0000-0001-6981-0712, Ho, Petula Sik Ying, Cao, Siyang et al. (1 more author) (2018) Sex with Chinese Characteristics : Sexuality research in/on 21st century China. JOURNAL OF SEX RESEARCH. pp. 486-521. ISSN 0022-4499

<https://doi.org/10.1080/00224499.2018.1437593>

Reuse

Items deposited in White Rose Research Online are protected by copyright, with all rights reserved unless indicated otherwise. They may be downloaded and/or printed for private study, or other acts as permitted by national copyright laws. The publisher or other rights holders may allow further reproduction and re-use of the full text version. This is indicated by the licence information on the White Rose Research Online record for the item.

Takedown

If you consider content in White Rose Research Online to be in breach of UK law, please notify us by emailing eprints@whiterose.ac.uk including the URL of the record and the reason for the withdrawal request.

SEX WITH CHINESE CHARACTERISTICS: SEXUALITY RESEARCH IN/ON 21ST CENTURY CHINA

Journal:	The Journal of Sex Research
Manuscript ID	17-247.R2
Manuscript Type:	Original Article
Keywords:	Sexual minorities, Women's sexuality, Desire, Extramarital Sex, Special Populations/Gay, lesbian, bisexual

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

SEX WITH CHINESE CHARACTERISTICS:SEXUALITY RESEARCH IN/ON 21ST CENTURY CHINA*Abstract

This article examines the changing contours of Chinese sexuality studies by locating recent research in historical context. Our aim is to use the literature we review to construct a picture of the sexual landscape in China and the socio-cultural and political conditions that have shaped it, enabling readers unfamiliar with China so understand its sexual culture and practices. In particular, we focus on the consequences of recent changes under the Xi regime for individuals' sexual lives and for research into sexuality. While discussing the social and political regulation of sexuality, we also attend to the emergence of new forms of gendered and sexual subjectivity in post-socialist China. We argue throughout that sexuality in China is interwoven with the political system in a variety of ways, in particular through the tension between neoliberal and authoritarian styles of governance. We explore normative and dissident sexualities as well as forms of sexual conduct that are officially "deviant" but nonetheless tolerated or even tacitly enabled by the Party-state. In particular we highlight the dilemmas and contradictions faced by China's citizens as they negotiate their sexual lives under "socialism with Chinese characteristics".

Key words: China; sexuality; Party-state; gender; inequality

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51

SEX WITH CHINESE CHARACTERISTICS: SEXUALITY RESEARCH IN/ON 21ST CENTURY CHINA¹

Introduction: Aims and Scope

The social transformation China has undergone in recent decades has had a major impact on many aspects of everyday life, including sexual life. Since China's economic reform and "opening up" to the rest of the world, there has been a gradual relaxation of the previously very restrictive sexual morality accompanied by changes in sexual conduct, especially among younger generations (Pan, 1993; Farrer, 2002; Pan & Huang, 2013; Jeffreys & Yu 2015). These developments have been variously characterized as a sexual revolution (Pan, 2006; Zhang, 2011), and as indicative of the emergence of new forms of sexual subjectivity (Rofel, 2007; Wong, 2016; Zhang, 2015). In this context it became easier to conduct research on sexuality in China. Furthermore, the increased openness to outsiders facilitated exchanges of intellectual ideas between Chinese and foreign academics, which widened the scope of what it was possible to research. The result has been a burgeoning of publications on sexual issues in recent years, from both indigenous and overseas scholars.

While China's opening up created some degree of academic freedom within the country, there are signs that Chinese sexuality (and other) scholars are now facing renewed constraints on their work. There have always been differences between work published within the PRC and that produced by scholars based elsewhere, including those in Hong

¹ The title is a play on the Chinese Party-state's designation of its post-Mao system as "socialism with Chinese characteristics." Our use of the tag "with Chinese characteristics" is not original, but is often used playfully or ironically by scholars writing on China. For example, David Harvey's A Brief History of Neoliberalism (2005) includes a chapter entitled "Neoliberalism with 'Chinese characteristics'" and Lisa Rofel's Desiring China (2007) has a chapter on "Cosmopolitanism with Chinese characteristics."

1
2
3 Kong and Taiwan. Those working outside China tend to be more critical and more
4
5 influenced by western theoretical traditions and are, of course, not subject to the 6
7 censorship of the Chinese state. While some within China have been pushing the 8
9 boundaries of what can be said and adopting more radical stances (Ding, 2016; Li, 2008;
10
11 Pan, 2009; Wang, 2017), the extent to which they will continue to be able to do so is now 12
13 in doubt given the tightening of state control and censorship under Xi Jinping's 14
15 presidency (see Ringen, 2016; Yuen. 2015).
16
17
18
19

20 It is clear from existing literature that the political ordering of sexuality is central to 21
22 making sense of Chinese sexual culture. The politics of sexuality in China is, therefore, a
23
24 central theme of this review, not just in the narrow sense of state regulation, but also in 25
26 terms of gender and sexual politics and the broader context of socio-economic 27
28 inequalities. Our aim is to construct a picture of the sexual landscape in China and the 29
30 socio-cultural and political conditions that have shaped it. We seek to enable readers
31
32 unfamiliar with China to understand the particularities of its sexual mores and practices
33
34 and especially the tensions and contradictions faced by its citizens as they negotiate their 35
36 sexual lives under “socialism with Chinese characteristics.” In so doing we draw attention
37
38 to the connections and disjunctions between official ideology, political control and actual 39
40 sexual practices on the ground.
41
42
43
44
45

46 In critically reviewing recent work on Mainland China and Hong Kong, primarily the 47
48 former, we have not attempted to cover anything and everything published about sex in 49
50 China. Given the extensive literature in the field we have had to be selective. We have 51
52 elected to address issues that have received considerable scholarly attention and then to 53
54 focus on the research that offers the greatest insight into those issues, while referencing
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 other contributions in passing. In some cases, where certain studies are particularly
4 significant and perceptive, we have discussed them in some depth. Since we are centrally 5 concerned with the contemporary sexual scene in a rapidly changing country, we 6 concentrate attention on work published in the last decade, while contextualizing this in 7 terms of longer term trends.
8
9

10
11 We begin by explaining how China has changed since the Mao era, how this has 12 impacted on individuals' sexual lives and how research on sexuality developed during 13 this period. Alongside this we chart the development of sexology in China, which can be 14 seen as contributing to the construction of a new ideal sexual subject in China (Wong, 15 2016). We then move on to consider literature on the socio-cultural, economic and 16 political factors shaping individual sexual lives, taking in normative and dissident
17 sexualities, the emergence of queer communities in China, commercial sex and then the 18 broader sexual economy and sexualization of culture. Finally we raise issues about the 19 conditions facing scholars and activists in China today, what this presages for the future
20 of "sex with Chinese characteristics" and how researchers might respond to the 21 challenges facing us.
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40

41 Socio-political context: the changing parameters of gender and sexual lives in China

42
43 Sexual lives are always lived within wider social contexts. There is a tendency, in both
44 Chinese and western cultures, to think of sexuality as a natural human attribute and a
45 uniquely private area of life, insulated from wider socio-cultural influences. Critical 46 scholarship has challenged these assumptions, drawing attention to the sociality of 47 sexuality, to the cultural shaping of sexual desires and practices, the non-sexual 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 motivations that may influence sexual conduct, the social conventions governing sexual
4 relationships and, overall, the way the sexual is embedded in everyday life (Jackson &
5 Scott, 2010). Of particular significance to a sociological understanding of sexuality is that 6 it is always gendered: gender and sexuality intertwine in complex ways, in particular in 7 the institutionalization of heterosexuality (Jackson, 2006). In the Chinese context this is 8 further complicated by the political control of sexuality and the political uses to which it 9 has been put.
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19

20 The 1970s were a pivotal decade for the development of both Hong Kong (then still a 21 British colony) and Mainland China. For Hong Kong it was a time when the colonial 22 administration began to take the wellbeing of its inhabitants more seriously, often seen as 23 a result of serious disturbances in 1967, representing a “watershed” in Hong Kong’s
24 governance (Cheung, 2009). In China, the 1970s saw the death of Mao Zedong in 1976
25 and the accession to power of Deng Xiaoping in 1979, signaling a radical change of 26 direction in China’s policies. It was Deng who initiated China’s economic reform and 27 “opening up” to the wider world.
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38

39 The changes in Hong Kong were less dramatic, but were significant. In the 1970s access
40 to education was widened, some limited welfare provision was established and old
41 patriarchal practices, notably polygyny, were abolished (Lee, 2004). It was then that 42 Hong Kong began its progress towards being the wealthy “world city” it is today, albeit 43 one with appallingly stark inequalities between rich and poor (Goodstadt, 2015). A 44 distinct sense of a Hong Kong identity also began to emerge (Tsang, 2004), which has 45 survived Hong Kong’s handover to China in 1997; indeed it has been strengthened by 46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 China's recent intervention in Hong Kong's affairs and by a more generalized resentment
4 of "mainlanders," who are now present in Hong Kong in increasing numbers (Kwok &
5 Chan, 2017). Hong Kong retains some autonomy under the handover agreement, 6
7
8 crucially far greater freedom of speech than in China, although there are fears that this 9
10
11
12 might be further eroded. These developments have taken place against the backdrop of 13
14
15 major transformations in mainland China.

16
17
18 At the end of the 1970s China's new regime had begun the process of replacing a 19
20
21 centrally planned economy with one based on market principles. The subsequent rapid 22
23
24 economic development and social change under Deng's and subsequent administrations 25
26
27 have had a significant impact on personal life as well as the overall structure of society.
28
29
30 In the first place they reduced direct party-state control over individual lives. Since the 31
32
33 establishment of the People's Republic of China in 1949 its leadership has been 34
35
36 concerned with regulating the sexual and intimate lives of citizens. Part of Mao's 37
38
39 revolutionary project was to raise the status of women. In addition to mobilizing women 40
41
42 into the labor force, measures were introduced to improve women's position in marriage.
43
44
45 The Marriage Act of 1950 prohibited arranged marriage and abolished polygyny (notably 46
47
48 well ahead of colonial Hong Kong). Marriage was now supposed to be founded on 49
50
51 mutual affection and companionship, though in rural areas arranged marriages were still 52
53
54 common (Yan, 2003). While the Mao era is often seen as one that minimized gender 55
56
57 difference, differences between men and women continued to be seen as "natural", 58
59
60 including in relation to their sexuality (Evans, 1997) and women workers received lower pay than men (Liu, 2007). While there is no doubt that Mao's reforms improved women's

1
2
3 position relative to men, it also exerted considerable influence over their intimate 4
5 relationships.
6

7
8 In the Mao era the CCP and its associated state bureaucracy operated at every level of 9
10 society from the top down to local communities. In urban areas the danwei (work unit)
11
12 system worked as an effective means of control. The danwei was far more than a 13
14 workplace: it also provided a range of welfare and other services, depending on its size,
15
16 including pensions, housing, health care and child care. Thus people both worked and 17
18 lived within danwei and its leadership (party cadres) oversaw every aspect of their lives.
19
20 In her study of women who had worked all their adult lives in danwei, until being laid off
21
22 in the early 2000s as a result of the economic reforms, Jieyu Liu (2007) paints a vivid 23
24 picture of how this system controlled personal lives and relationships. The danwei
25
26 leadership found marriage partners for women workers, pressured them to marry
27
28 politically suitable men, allocated marital homes (to the husband if the couple were in 29
30 different danwei) intervened in marital disputes and after the introduction of the one child
31
32 policy, enforced it ruthlessly. Because women lived in the danwei, at close quarters with 33
34 their colleagues or husbands' colleagues, privacy was difficult to maintain. Any family 35
36 dispute or difficulty, any breach of propriety or morality, was likely to come to the 37
38 attention of their leaders and thus lead to further intervention in their personal business.
39
40 The danwei system also affected individual's relationships in other ways. Zhang (2015)
41
42 draws attention to the problems of couples who worked in different danwei. Because it 43
44 was close to impossible to change one's workplace if a couple worked at some distance
45
46 from each other they were effectively kept apart for long periods.
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 This system gradually declined over the reform era as state owned enterprises were either
4 privatized or abandoned many of their former functions in order to remain competitive.
5
6 State-owned enterprises and government organizations, including universities, continue
7
8 to have a party-secretary who monitors conduct at work, but individuals have become 9
10 much freer from direct Party surveillance in their private lives. As the system of job
11
12 allocation gave way to a capitalist style labor market, individuals applied for their own
13
14 posts. While this reduced job security and increased competition for jobs, it also gave 15
16 individuals some choice (within the limits of the market and their qualifications) and 17
18 made it easier to move between posts and occupations.
19
20
21
22
23

24 The situation in the countryside was different. Women in the countryside in the Mao era
25
26 still lived within traditional patrilocal and patrilineal families, and while they contributed 27
28 to production had little financial independence (Gao, 1994). In the reform era the de-
29
30 collectivization of agriculture and the growth of a market economy led to the 31
32 development of rural industry. This gave some rural women the chance of employment
33
34 and thus an independent income; it also “lessened their dependence on the household and 35
36 their husband, and increased their autonomy” (Gao, 1994, p.85). Most were, however, 37
38 still restricted to rural areas by the hukou (household registration) system, introduced in 39
40 the Mao era to classify the population into rural and urban and prevent migration to the 41
42 cities. While still in place today, the hukou system has been gradually relaxed to allow 43
44 (technically temporary) migration to cities to provide labor for expanding market
45
46 production. Beginning in the early reform era, when the first Special Economic Zones
47
48 were set up, migration has increased rapidly. At first most of this migrant labor force
49
50 comprised young single people, men working in construction and both men and women, 51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 especially the latter, in factories. Young women workers (dagongmei, working sisters)
4
5 thus escaped the patriarchal control of their families and communities and, despite 6
7 grueling working conditions, could dream of a freer life (see, e.g. Pun, 2005). Some of 8
9 these young women turned their back on long hours and low pay to work in the sex
10
11 industry and capitalize on the economic and social opportunities this afforded them 12
13 (Ding, 2016). More recently whole families have been on the move, with consequences 14
15 for their negotiation of gendered expectations of work and care (Choi & Peng 2016), 16
17 while China's booming cities are creating new demands for workers, including as 18
19 domestic servants and nannies for the expanding middle class (Gaetano, 2015). Urban 20
21 populations have also become more mobile as people moved in search of educational, 22
23 career or social opportunities. This more mobile population is far less susceptible to state 24
25 control, as well as family and community surveillance, than was once the case. A further 26
27 consequence of greater geographical mobility is the physical separation of different 28
29 generations within a family, which has contributed to increasing the independence of 30
31 young people, strengthening the autonomy of nuclear families among younger 32
33 generations and a renegotiation of the norms of filial piety (xiao), with less emphasis on 34
35 the tradition of obedience to elders and more on reciprocal and emotional bonds (see Liu, 36
37 2016; Zhang, 2016).

38
39
40 As economic reform progressed, rising living standards and the growth of consumerism
41
42 helped engender a new sensibility among more affluent Chinese citizens, in which the 43
44 frugality and collective norms of the past gave way to the individual pursuit of 45
46 consumption and pleasure, including sexual pleasure (Rofel, 2007; Zhang, 2015), which 47
48 also began to inspire the aspirations of those less privileged (Gaetano, 2008, 2015). In her 49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 influential work, Desiring China, Lisa Rofel (2007) analyses this new sensibility in terms
4 of the construction of “desiring subjects.” Through her conversations with young women
5 and men, she observed the emergence of a new idea of human nature emerging in China
6 in the 1990s and early 2000s, which had “the desiring subject at its core: the individual
7 who operates through sexual, material and affective self-interest” (p.3). The desiring 8 subject marks a turn away from a class based subjectivity towards becoming 9 cosmopolitan transnational subjects. Whereas in the 1980s, people she met still 10 positioned themselves in relation to political transformations in China, the younger
11 generation, with no memory of the Mao era, were uninterested in politics and more
12 concerned with expressing their feelings and pursuing their own desires and ambitions
13 through consumption, sexual practices and relationships, making money, and travelling.
14 They aspired to become cosmopolitan, transcending their locality, but with some 15 uncertainty about how to inhabit this desiring subjectivity appropriately. Rofel makes it
16 clear that this subjectivity was not constructed in opposition to the state but was part of a 17 reconfiguration of the relationship between government and citizenship and was 18 constructed through individuals’ engagement with public culture.

19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41 This new subjectivity is gendered, reflecting a repudiation of Maoist gender politics,
42 “which is said to have emasculated men, masculinized women, and mistakenly equated 43 the genders” (Rofel, 2007, p.117). It is thus associated with new forms of femininity and 44 masculinity. In discussing how young heterosexual women negotiate this new 45 subjectivity and the cultural landscape that gives rise to it, Rofel recognizes the potential
46 heterogeneity and instability of individuals’ negotiations of the socio-cultural changes
47 they are living through. She nonetheless sketches some key elements of shared desire 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 these subjects embody. She highlights how they distance themselves from their mothers'
4 imagined past in the Mao era, which they see as a time of frugality and deprivation, of 5 sacrifice and constraint. They see themselves "as having within their grasp the possibility 6 of becoming free from all constraints" (p.118), and envision themselves as freed from 7 both political control and a selfhood embedded in kinship. This reconstructed past,
8 derived from films and novels rather than their mothers' own experience, involves 9 "structured forgettings" of the gains women made in the Mao era – for example freedom
10 to choose their spouse and the ideal of companionate marriage (p.123). They also depict
11 the Mao era as one of sexual repression, bemoan the sexual conservatism of their parents'
12 generation, and present themselves as being savvy about sex. Yet they also worry "about 13 how to be a sexually open woman and maintain respectability" (p.127). While seeking 14 romantic love and hoping for modern marriage and affectionate husbands, these single 15 women are aware of the constraints that married women face. And so they should be.
16
17 More recent research suggests that Chinese wives are still expected to take responsibility
18 for housework, childcare and maintaining filial obligations towards parents and in-laws
19 (Cao, 2017; Cheung & Tang, 2017; Du et al., 2015; Zhang, 2016). It is thus entirely 20 probable that these "free" young women's future would be less rosy than they imagined.
21
22

23
24 While young women seek a transcendence of locality through consumer identity, Rofel 25 (2017) argues that they also undergo "a domestication of cosmopolitanism by way of 26 renegotiating China's place in the world" (p.111). This raises the question of how they 27 could be simultaneously Chinese and cosmopolitan. These young women embody a
28 tension between "transcendent desire" and "protective Chineseness." Their Chineseness
29 is manifested through being positioned as the ultimate and "proper consumers" (p.112)
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 within China's rapidly developing consumer culture. Being Chinese also comes to the 4 fore in their attitude to foreigners. While consuming western culture as a sign of their 5 cosmopolitanism, the young women Rofel met were also critical of western, and
6 particularly US, culture as inferior to Chinese civilization. They also saw sexual liaisons
7 with or marriage to westerners as problematic, potentially exploitative, and carrying with 8 them overtones of ethnocentric or racist attitudes to Chinese women.
9

10
11 In the decade since Desiring China was published, the PRC's consumer society has 12 grown exponentially as the middle class expanded so that many more Chinese citizens are 13 drawn into the aspirational culture and subjectivity that Rofel describes. The 14 reaffirmation of a supposed "natural" femininity and its distinctiveness from masculinity
15 has also persisted and is manifested in many of the issues we will discuss. It remains the 16 case in China, we would argue, that "the cosmopolitan self one should embody is both 17 implicitly non-gendered and easier for men to achieve" (Rofel, 2007, p.117). Certainly, 18 the greater sexual freedom the reform era has brought with it offers more opportunities to 19 men, with fewer costs. Not only do men not have to worry that sexual activities and 20 sexualized consumption will damage their reputations, but sex can actually express a 21 man's status and pinwei (good taste), as Song & Lee (2010) reveal in their study of men's 22 lifestyle magazines. Most of these magazines are Chinese versions of western titles and 23 marketed to wealthy men. They "equate the consumption of luxury items and women
24 with the embodiment of cultural capital" (Song & Lee, 2010, p.117). Of particular note
25 are the soft porn magazines, such as the Chinese version of FHM (For Him). This 26 magazine is seen in the UK, where it originated, as a "lad's mag", read mainly by young 27 working-class men. In China, however, its partner publication, Nanren Zhuang, "is 28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 categorized as an upscale, high quality commodity”, with its images of scantily clad 4
5 “sexy” women serving to demonstrate to the reader “what he could have if he adopted the 6
7 lifestyle of high-level consumption” (p.215). That this magazine can become a marker of 8
9 good taste (pinwei) and status, it is suggested, indicates that “in China hyper-male 10
11 sexuality is constructed as a privilege of the rich” (p.216).
12
13

14
15 Further insight into the construction of masculine subjectivity in the reform era, and the 16
17 importance of sexuality within it, is provided by Everett Zhang’s (2015) study of China’s
18
19 apparent “impotence epidemic.” Like Rofel, Zhang sees the aspirations generated by 20
21 China’s market economy as producing particular kinds of subjectivity to which desire is 22
23 central. In contrast with the Maoist era in which collective goals were promoted, 24
25 individual desire, including sexual desire has been promoted. The desire for sexual 26
27 enjoyment can now be articulated and, moreover, sexual potency is seen as central to 28
29 manhood. It is in this context that impotence, Zhang (2015, p.15) argues, is to be 30
31 understood, as signifying “an ontological shift in human existence in China from 32
33 downplaying desire to promoting the desire to desire.” 34
35
36
37
38

39 While China’s consumer culture has provided a market for sexualized commodities and 40
41 given rise to new subjectivities, there are other reasons for the changing the sexual 42
43 behavior of the populace in the reform era. One issue is increased geographical mobility, 44
45 freeing many young people from parental surveillance. Another, and important, 46
47 contributing factor in the liberalization of China’s sexual mores, noted by numerous 48
49 researchers and commentators, is the one child policy, introduced in 1979 (Jeffreys & Yu, 50
51 2015; Pan, 1993, 2006). This has recently been modified to a two child policy in order to 52
53 deal with the population imbalances, especially the ageing population and skewed sex 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 ratio, associated with the original policy. The origins and consequences of China's 4 population policies, however, are complex and not unidirectional.
5
6

7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Alongside the concern with limiting population growth – which had existed among elements within the CCP even in the Mao era – was a longstanding concern with the quality of the population (Greenhalgh & Winckler, 2005). The 1950 Marriage Act prohibited marriage if either of a couple suffered from any of a diverse list of medical conditions, including a catch-all provision “any other diseases regarded by medical science” as making individuals unfit for marriage (McMillan, 2006, p.70). This provision, which has remained in altered form in later versions of the Marriage Act, was intended to ensure the birth of healthy children and was backed by a compulsory pre-marital medical check-up but, according to Winckler & Greenhalgh (2005, p.63), attempts to impose it were abandoned because the health service found it impossible to implement. In addition to the one child policy the Deng and subsequent administrations have also given renewed attention to the quality of children and to educating the population on maternal and infant health. Pre-marital health checks were made compulsory under the 1994 National Eugenics Law, later renamed the Law on Maternal and Infant Health. Couples required a certificate confirming they had no conditions disqualifying them from marriage before they were permitted to marry. New regulations made this voluntary in 2003 (McMillan, 2006). MacMillan describes the system in a Beijing maternity hospital in the late 1990s as involving a battery of tests marked 0 for normal and 1 for abnormal; thus “marriages, families and futures [were] being decided on the basis of binary logic” (2006, p.71). In addition, women underwent an invasive physical examination of the vagina, vulva and anus, presumably, as McMillan comments, to see if anything might interfere with

1
2
3 childbirth. While such practices, in addition to the compulsory limitation of births to a
4 single child, could involve intrusive policing of women's bodies, the ultimate
5 consequences for women have been more mixed. The concerns about the "quality" of 6 children are not limited to maternal and child health, but affect all aspects of child-
7 rearing, for which women remain largely responsible. More positively, the one child
8 policy has reduced the pressure on women to have numerous children, which is welcome
9 to many. The urban Chinese population seems to have accepted having an only child, no
10 longer needing compulsion to ensure compliance (Greenhalgh & Winckler, 2005).

11
12 The policy has also affected the gendered expectations of the only children born as a 13 result of it, the oldest of whom are now having children themselves. This cohort of 14 children became the "only hope" of their parents (Fong, 2004), which meant that children
15 of both sexes received unprecedented levels of investment from their parents, intensifying
16 as China's marketizing economy became increasingly competitive (Zhong & Li, 2017),
17 thus contributing to raising their "quality." Since girls no longer had to compete with 18 brothers for parental attention and investment, this undermined the past privileging of 19 boys so that their educational and career opportunities were enhanced. This generation 20 grew up accepting the one child policy and thus free from the pressures to have large 21 families, which had been a feature of China's patriarchal lineage system.

22
23 The one child policy meant that sex could no longer be seen as primarily procreative. Pan
24 (1993, 2006) views this as providing the basis for a "sexual revolution" in China with a
25 new emphasis on sexual pleasure and fulfilment in marriage. The separation of sex from 26 its reproductive function, combined with the economic independence of the younger
27 generation, also made it possible for young urban adults to envisage and practice pre-28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 marital sexual intimacy. This change in sexual mores became evident in major urban
4 centers such as Shanghai from the 1990s (Farrer, 2002, 2010, 2011) and has since
5
6 centers such as Shanghai from the 1990s (Farrer, 2002, 2010, 2011) and has since 7
8 apparently become widespread (Farrer, 2014; Jeffreys & Yu, 2015; Pei et al., 2007;
9
10 Zarafonetis, 2017). Many young heterosexual women, however, contemplate engaging in 11
12 sexual intercourse only with a future husband and the Chinese still place a premium on 13
14 female virginity (Wang & Ho, 2011; Wang, 2017), leading some to continue to defend 15
16 their virginity (Xie, in press; Zarafonetis, 2017). The de-coupling of sex from 17
18 reproduction has been seen, in western contexts, as creating the preconditions for sex as 19
20 recreational and ultimately, with many shifts over a century or making possible an 21
22 acceptance of alternatives to heterosexuality (Giddens, 1992; Seidman, 2003, 2015). We 23
24 cannot assume that China will follow this same path. Same-sex relations are still 25
26 stigmatized in China, even in Hong Kong (Kong, 2010, 2012, 2016; Suen, 2015, 2016; 27
28 Tang, 2011, 2014b). China's family centered morality and its Confucian underpinnings
29
30 make it unlikely that alternatives to heterosexual marriage will be accepted in the 31
32 foreseeable future. Political developments since 2000 have, if anything, strengthened the 33
34 emphasis on the family and its role in upholding socialist morality.

35
36
37
38
39
40
41 As China moved towards a market economy it lost much of its socialist rationale, 42
43 although the reformed system has been characterized as "socialism with Chinese 44
45 characteristics." This concept, a means of "tethering economic reform to neoliberal 46
47 capitalism" (Rofel, 2007, p.111), was initiated and defined in the report of the 48
49 Seventeenth Congress of CCP in 1982 (Cheung, 2012; Solé-Farràs, 2008). As the market
50
51 reform progressed further, Marxism lost much of its salience as a means of legitimating
52
53 economic marketization as a route to true socialism. It was in this context that, at the 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 beginning of the 21st Century, Confucianism was revived as a valued part of China's 4 cultural heritage (Bell, 2008, 2010) and deployed as a key element of "Chinese
5 characteristics." Disavowed under the Mao regime and attacked as a feudal remnant
6 during the Cultural Revolution, Confucianism began to be rehabilitated under Hu Jintao's
7 presidency. In a speech delivered in February 2005, Hu noted: "Confucius said, 8 'Harmony is something to be cherished'" (Bell, 2010, p. 9); a few months later he 9 instructed party cadres to build a "harmonious society" (ibid). Confucianism has also 10 featured in China's self-representation to the wider world. It was very prominent, for 11 example, in the opening ceremony of the 2008 Beijing Olympics, which "highlighted 12 Confucian themes, quoting the Analects of Confucius at the opening ceremony and in 13 booklets handed out to visiting journalists" (Bell, 2010, p.ix). Confucius Institutes were 14 set up in many countries from 2004 onwards to promote Chinese language and culture
15 and are also widely seen as a means of increasing China's soft power, if not necessarily 16 effectively (Hartig, 2012; Lahtinen, 2015; Yang, 2010). Confucianism, it has been argued,
17 "provides new discursive resources for continuing authoritarianism" (Cheung, 2012, 18 p.205; see also Wu, 2014; Xu, 2017). Central to this is the emphasis on harmony.

19
20
21 The idea of "harmony" or "the harmonious society" became increasingly prominent in 22 the Party-state's political rhetoric and has also been used by the Hong Kong government.
23 This emphasis on harmony makes it difficult for those subject to authority to question it:
24 they are then disrupting harmony. We have elsewhere characterized this ideology as 25 "hierarchical harmony" (Ho, Jackson & Kong, 2017), since it inculcates subservience in 26 both the public sphere and the private sphere of intimacy, limiting what it is possible to 27 say and do. Confucianism is gendered at its core in that male authority starts with the

1
2
3 family and permeates every level of the societal hierarchy until it reaches the center of 4 political power, be that the Emperor or President (Sung & Pascall, 2014). The family was,
5 within Confucianism, considered “the foundation of the state” (Mencius, as cited in Guo,
6 2010). Although the expectation that women will be subservient and obedient within the 7 family has been challenged since the founding of the PRC, the idea of the family as a 8 fundamental source of social stability, and of women’s responsibility for maintaining 9 harmony within it, has persisted and has arguably been strengthened during the reform
10 era and reaffirmed within CCP propaganda. This is exemplified by a 2006 Party
11 organized campaign to find China’s “10 Outstanding Mothers”, who should demonstrate 12 a range of wifely and motherly virtues, be successful career women and be patriotic and 13 loyal to the CCP (Guo, 2010, p.49).
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28

29 The family in contemporary China is seen as the “cell” of society, the basis of society
30 conceived as a living organism (Sigley, 2002, 2006). As Sigley argues, from this 31 perspective Chinese society can only remain healthy if “all its constituent elements
32 function properly;” hence family stability “lies at the heart of the...concern of China’s 33 elites with the issue of social stability” (Sigley, 2006, p.49). This goes some way to 34 explaining why sexuality should be seen as politically important in China, in combination
35 with “the Party-state’s doctrine on socialist spiritual civilization” (Sigley, 2006, p. 47).
36 Hence the Party has sought to promote monogamous marriage and control any sexual 37 relations that might threaten it and thus also threaten social stability though what Sigley
38 (2006, p.47) terms “the policing of virtue.” It is clear, however, that recent trends in 39 sexual conduct indicate that the endeavor to keep sex within the confines of heterosexual
40 monogamy have not been successful. In opening up and promoting economic growth 41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 China has adopted forms of neoliberal governance that allow for innovation and for the 4 construction of new enterprising, aspirational and consumption oriented desiring subjects
5 (Rofel, 2007). The consequences of this for the sexual choices these subjects make has 6 been a source of disquiet among conservative elements in the Party. In turning its 7 “socialist subjects into capitalist consumers,” and thereby creating profitable business
8 opportunities (Sigley, 2006, p.54), the Party-state has faced certain dilemmas. The 9 cultural industries, which the leadership sees as important to promoting “spiritual
10 sustenance” and enhancing morality are a case in point. Sigley (2006, p.55) quotes a 2001
11 State Council document that reaffirms the importance of the cultural market but laments
12 the existence of content that is “vulgar” and “pornographic,” which is deemed to harm
13 social stability. These pronouncements clearly reveal the tensions between a neoliberal 14 market economy and the Party-state’s more paternalistic and authoritarian attempts to 15 guide and control its population, already evident in the early 2000s. This tension has 16 heightened with the growth of the internet and new social media, so that more and more
17 cultural production – and also activism – has been taking place beyond Party-state control.
18 In the context of the current Xi regime in China, the conservative forces within the CCP,
19 which Sigley describes, have come to the fore, with tightening controls over those seen as 20 disruptive of social harmony (Fincher, 2016; Yuen, 2015).

21
22 Since Xi Jinping assumed office as the General Secretary of the Communist Party and 23 President of the PRC in 2012, the regime has become more authoritarian and has been 24 described as “a perfect dictatorship”, that is “relentless, determined, and unforgiving”
25 (Ringen, 2016, p.ix). Xi has dealt ruthlessly with political opponents and cracked down
26 on real and imagined oppositional forces with brutality. In some ways it may be seen as 27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 harking back to the Mao era with increased use of overt propaganda and a cult of 4
5 personality around Xi himself. Xi's concern with strengthening his own control of the 6
7 Party and the Party's control over the populace has been seen as deriving from a number
8
9 of factors; these include his aspiration to put the CCP on a firm footing for the future as it 10
11 approaches its centennial, his perception of external threats to China and a determination 12
13 to restrict foreign influences, for example through NGO activities and the internet, that 14
15 potentially challenge the Party-state's authority and disrupt social stability (Lampton, 16
17 2016; Womak, 2017; Wu, 2014; Xu, 2017). With the growth of internet activism in 18
19 China, campaigns for democracy in Hong Kong, the pro-independence movement in 20
21 Taiwan and continued unrest in Xinjiang and Tibet, all of which have received extensive 22
23 and sympathetic global media coverage, Xi's repressive moves make some kind of sense.

24
25
26
27
28
29 The increasing authoritarianism in China is beginning to have consequences for those 30
31 campaigning around sexuality. In 2015 five young feminists were arrested in Beijing for 32
33 planning to distribute stickers protesting about sexual harassment on public transport.
34
35 They were subject to criminal detention (though they have since been released). While 36
37 their action posed no obvious threat to the Party-state, it occurred against a backdrop of a 38
39 general crackdown on "security risks", which apparently now include feminist and sexual 40
41 rights activists (Fincher, 2016). NGOs affiliated with or funded by international 42
43 organizations have also come under tighter control, including those providing support for 44
45 sexual minorities or services such as abortion for unmarried women. Some have been 46
47 forced to close because they cannot conform to new regulations that severely curtail their 48
49 activities (Yuen, 2015). Sexual slurs are also being used against political dissidents, some 50
51 of whom are being forced to "confess" to sexual misdemeanors on state television as a 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 means of shaming them and subjecting them to moral condemnation (Zeng, 2016). In an 4
5 online article, feminist and political dissident Zeng Jinyan comments: It is not safe to 6
7 engage in community work or collective actions to fight for sexual freedom, individual
8
9 rights or the rights of the community groups that one is in ... One has to be cautious
10
11 about sex lest one produces truths about oneself that can be converted to political capital 12
13 useful for political oppression by the authorities. (Our translation from the Chinese 14
15 original).
16
17
18
19

20 Sexuality research in China

21
22

23 The beginnings of academic interest in sexuality in China date back to the Republican era
24
25 in the early twentieth century when intellectuals began to engage with western scientific 26
27 ideas (Chiang, 2010; Kong, 2016; Sang, 2003; Wong, 2016). The foundation of the PRC
28
29 along with the turbulent events preceding it – war with Japan and civil war – did not 30
31 foster further development of these early explorations. There were some publications on 32
33 sexuality in the Mao era, mostly emphasizing the “natural” basis of male and female 34
35 sexuality (Evans, 1997), but it was in the reform era that the field of sexuality research
36
37 began to be developed further. After China’s opening up, science and technology were 38
39 promoted as central to progress and the state’s modernization program. In this climate a 40
41 sexual science began to emerge (Kong, 2016; Wong, 2016). At first this research was 42
43 dominated by a bio-medical model of sexuality in the interests of promoting “healthy”
44
45 sexual development and relationships and combatting sexual ignorance. The first survey
46
47 of the sexual habits of the Chinese population was conducted in 1988-9, since when 48
49 others have followed. More generally, survey methods have continued to dominate 50
51 sexuality research within China.
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 A central problem with such surveys is the lack of ethical governance in Chinese social
4 science research, so that research subjects often receive no assurances about anonymity
5 and confidentiality (Huang & Pan, 2009). Huang and Pan argue that this situation,
6
7 combined with a “culture of conformity”, impacts on the results of research. They use the 8 phrase “culture of conformity” to refer to the dominant cultural norms that prompt
9
10 Chinese individuals to comply with the mainstream in terms of surface attitudes, which 11 are probably not in accordance with their actual experiences (Huang & Pan, 2009). This, 12 they suggest, is not merely a strategy of self-protection, but also a form of “collective 13
14 unconscious” shaped by cultural mores and by Confucian ethics, which stress the 15 maintenance of harmony within personal relationships and social interactions (Huang &
16
17 Pan, 2009). As a result, participants are highly likely to respond to survey questions 18 according to their imagined normative answer, which casts doubts on the validity of 19
20 much Chinese research.
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32
33
34 In addition, concerns about censorship may lead researchers to play safe, to present 35 superficial findings and avoid being too critical, especially when dealing with potentially 36 politically sensitive issues. Perhaps for this reason, work published in China tends to take 37 a “problem and solution” approach (e.g. Liu, 2012; Ding & Zhang, 2014; Sun & Mei, 38
39 2011), thus aligning research with government agendas. For example, Zhai (2013)
40 defines sex-work as a social problem, discusses the potential for legalization then 41 suggests that rights for sex workers should be combined with social control in the 42
43 interests of greater social stability and harmonious development. Qualitative research, 44
45 which might lead to less conformist conclusions, is underdeveloped. The potential of 46
47 qualitative research to break through cultural conformity is revealed by the work of one 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 of the pioneers of qualitative sexuality studies in China, Li Yinhe. She has managed to
4 breach the conventions of conformity in gathering detailed, and often colorful, accounts
5 of participants' sexual lives. Her published work, however, seems to present only the raw
6 data – fascinating stories but with little analysis (see, e.g. Li, 2008).
7
8
9

10
11
12
13 Given the longstanding concern about sexuality as a source of social instability, along
14 with contacts between Chinese and overseas sexuality activist and researchers, it is sadly 15 not surprising that the intensification of authoritarianism is affecting those engaged in 16 sexualities research. Whereas Sigley (2006) noted that the debates over sexuality in the 17 early 2000s had afforded space to more radical voices, such as those of Li Yinhe and Pan
18 Suiming, that space now seems to be rapidly contracting. In October 2014, under the 19 headline “sexologist punished for swindling research funds”, the China Daily (a Party
20 paper) reported that Pan Suiming had “received an administrative penalty for swindling
21 State scientific research funds,” had been demoted and would be made to retire early. The 22 only “swindle” mentioned was his “failure to provide invoices of payments to sex
23 workers during interviews” (Yang, 2014, n.p.). Our colleagues in mainland China tell us 24 that censorship is tightening up so that they struggle to have their work published, that 25 funding sources, especially those from overseas are no longer accessible to them, that 26 controls on what they can teach have been tightened and that a number of events based 27 upon sexualities research have recently been cancelled or held clandestinely.
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46

47
48 The limitations Chinese scholars have faced over the years explain why it has been 49 Chinese scholars based overseas (e.g. Liu, 2016; Zheng, 2015), along with foreign,
50 Taiwanese and Hong Kong researchers, who have conducted most analytical and critical 51 inquiries into sexuality in China (see, e.g. Chen 2017; Farrer, 2002, 2010; Kam, 2013;
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Rofel, 2007). Hong Kong scholars' contribution to the field has been significant. They 4
5 have enjoyed greater access to mainland China since the handover, yet work under very 6
7 different conditions from mainland scholars. Hong Kong's university system dates back
8
9 to the colonial era and was based on a British model. This included the academic freedom
10
11 essential for critical inquiry and for potentially contentious fields, such as sexuality 12
13 studies, to flourish. It took some time, however, for the study of sexuality to become 14
15 established in the humanities and social sciences here, beginning in the 1990s and 16
17 growing since then. The relatively late start may, in part, be attributable to Hong Kong's
18
19 rather conservative sexual culture reinforced by a strong Christian influence – a heritage 20
21 of British colonialism (see e.g. Ho & Hu, 2016). There are now, however, a number of 22
23 leading scholars in the field based at Hong Kong's universities working on both Hong 24
25 Kong and China (see e.g. Choi, 2011a, 2011b; Choi & Luo, 2016; Ho, 2006, 2008, 2014; 26
27 Kam, 2010, 2013, 2014; Kong, 2010, 2016; Suen, 2015, 2017; Tang, 2011, 2012, 2017;
28
29 Tsang 2017; Yau, 2010). Some NGOs have also been active in conducting surveys, for 30
31 example the Association for the Advancement of Feminism's survey on women's sexual 32
33 desires and experiences (Chan, 2008) and The Family Planning Association of Hong 34
35 Kong's (2014) regular surveys of youth sexualities. Scholars in Hong Kong have also 36
37 worked with activists. For example, despite hosting a queer film festival and an annual 38
39 pride march, there are no rights for same-sex couples or protection from discrimination 40
41 for sexual minorities. Academic researchers are providing some of the necessary 42
43 ammunition for campaigns for such rights (Wong, 2006; Tang, 2009; Suen, 2015, 2016, 44
45 2017). Some sexuality researchers report still feeling marginalized relative to the 46
47 mainstream of their various academic disciplines. There are also signs that Hong Kong's 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 academic freedoms as a whole may be under threat as China becomes more
4
5 interventionist in Hong Kong's affairs, which does not bode well for critical academic 6
7 work of any kind (Carrico, 2018). For now, Hong Kong scholars continue to play an 8
9 important role in representing China's sexual culture to the wider academic world. A 10
11 central feature of that culture is the concern with "normality."
12
13
14
15
16
17
18

19 Normative and dissident sexualities

20
21 Being "normal", behaving "normally", or like everyone else, is crucial to the Chinese.
22
23 This is reflected in the title of a recent collection on same-sex sexualities in China; As 24
25 Normal as Possible (Yau, 2010). This way of thinking has deep roots in Chinese cultural 26
27 traditions, associated with the Confucian emphasis on harmony and fitting in to one's 28
29 allotted place in a hierarchical social order. Since the establishment of the PRC, normality 30
31 has been defined politically and enforced, to greater or lesser degrees, by the Party-state.
32
33 Sexuality has not escaped such regulation, but how sexual normality has been defined has 34
35 changed over time while remaining highly heteronormative. The Mao era could be said to 36
37 be one that was profoundly anti-sexual, with tight censorship severely restricting any 38
39 open representation or discussion of sex. In seeking to raise the status of women and 40
41 guard against western bourgeois sexual ideas and anything that might seem "decadent", 42
43 sexuality was subject to rigid controls, confined to marriage and not even a fit subject for 44
45 scientific enquiry. The ideal socialist citizen of this period was largely asexual. Since the 46
47 reform era, however, new versions of normality have emerged.
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 In her insightful analysis of the development of Chinese sexology, Day Wong (2016)
4 discusses how, since research on sexuality resumed in the reform era, it has been 5 dominated by a bio-medical model aimed at producing the ideal socialist citizen. While 6 drawing on western scientific ideas, Chinese researchers were careful to screen out
7 elements of western sexual culture seen as “decadent” or “excessive”. The promotion of 8 sexual health and sexual knowledge was seen as part of China’s modernization project,
9 countering the sexual ignorance and silence of the Mao era and eradicating “feudal,
10 irrational ideas about sex” (Wong, 2016, p.72; Kong, 2016). Sexual pleasure was 11 promoted as essential to a harmonious marriage. Chinese sociologists promoted an 12 indigenous Chinese concept, xing fu (sexual happiness, 性福), a pun on “happiness”
13 (xingfu, 幸福), to enable people to make sense of their sexuality. In the past, marital 14 partners were expected to provide each other with xingfu (‘happiness’). Now, they are 15 obliged to provide sexual happiness (xingfu). As Pan & Huang (2007) have pointed out,
16 in Chinese culture, fu (‘happiness’) does not simply refer to pleasure, but to having fu or 17 bliss, a state of contentment that can be associated with fortune, harmony, spiritual 18 abundance, and relief from anxiety.

19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41 This deployment of sexual science also drew on notions of civilization, quality (suzhi)
42 and progress. “The process of becoming civilized required the acquisition of scientific 43 knowledge about sex, which helps improve not only marital relations but also the quality
44 (suzhi) of the population” (Wong, 2016, p.72). Wong argues that this new sexual science
45 produced a new ideal sexual subject by creatively blending two apparently contradictory
46 discourses. On the one hand, the construction of a socialist spiritual civilization calls on 47 people to embrace collectivist values such as devotion to the nation, and to cultivate the 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 core values of a harmonious society: self-restraint, harmony, and balance. On the other 4
5 hand, in China's reform era a more neo-liberal discourse of self-reliance has emerged,
6
7 within which individuals are expected to master their own lives and advance themselves
8
9 through their own efforts, rather than living the largely pre-destined and egalitarian life
10
11 promoted in the Mao period. "The ideal form of subjecthood is to incorporate both the 12
13 qualities of a scientifically minded, enlightened subject and the communist-collectivist
14
15 values of a socialist subject" (Wong, 2016, p. 79).
16
17
18
19

20 The ideal sexual citizen is supposed to exercise self-restraint in avoiding sex outside
21
22 marriage and seek harmony and balance within marriage. The only fully legitimate form
23
24 of sexual expression in China is heterosexual, marital and monogamous. In actuality, 25
26 however, pornography and prostitution are widespread despite being technically illegal.
27
28 This is perhaps surprising given the power of the Chinese state, implying that it is 29
30 ineffective in its regulatory efforts. As we will discuss later, the picture is more
31
32 complicated, with state agencies themselves implicated in sustaining supposedly deviant
33
34 practices. In some other respects the state is very effective in regulating its citizens'
35
36 intimate lives, as was the case with the one child policy. As the privileged only children
37
38 created by this policy reach adulthood, they expect to have more autonomy in their lives
39
40 than previous generations. They can be seen as desiring subjects (Rofel, 2007), 41
42 influenced by the neo-liberal discourse of self-reliance and relative freedom of choice in 43
44 daily life. They have also been seen as leading China's purported "sexual revolution" 45
46
47
48
49
50 (Zhang, 2011).
51
52

53 The idea that China has undergone a "sexual revolution" is popular among both Chinese 54
55 and Western scholars (Pan, 2006; Burger, 2012) but can be misleading. First, it should 56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 not be taken as implying a “freeing” of sexuality from “repression”, or the resurgence of 4
5 “natural” sexual proclivities. This essentialist understanding of sexuality has been 6
7 rigorously critiqued from a variety of perspectives among scholars of sexuality (Foucault,
8
9 1981; Gagnon & Simon, 1973, 2004; Jackson & Scott, 2010; Jeffreys & Yu, 2015). What 10
11 we are witnessing is the construction of new forms of sexual subjectivity and changes in 12
13 sexual mores which are not necessarily liberating. In evaluating the changes that have 14
15 occurred, it is particularly important to recognize the persistence of gender inequality in 16
17 China and that, in some respects, it has been exacerbated by the shift to a post-socialist 18
19 society (Hong-Fincher, 2014; Liu, 2015). While educated young women have more 20
21 choices and opportunities open to them, the Maoist emphasis on gender equality has been 22
23 abandoned in favor of promoting forms of femininity that increase women’s vulnerability
24
25 to exploitation and reinforce their traditional roles and responsibilities within their 26
27 families (Hong-Fincher, 2015; Liu, 2007, 2015)
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 One of the most striking features of Chinese society is the centrality of marriage and 35
36 family. The Party-state emphasizes the importance of the family as the foundation of 37
38 social stability and harmony (Sigley, 2002; 2006; Guo, 2010; To, 2013, 2015).
39

40 Unsurprisingly, then, a central aspect of China’s “culture of conformity” is the pressure to 41
42 marry. Marriage is near universal; only a tiny proportion of Chinese citizens never marry
43
44 (Jeffreys & Yu, 2015). There is some concern, on the part of both the state and parents of 45
46 young people, over rates of marriage. The number of new marital unions contracted fell
47
48 by 9.1% between 2013 and 2015 (Jeffreys & Yu, 2015). In part this decline simply 49
50 reflects the lower proportion of young unmarried people in the population due to the one
51
52 child policy. It is also a result of a skewed sex ratio, with far more men of marriageable
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 age than women and a rising age at first marriage. Although many young people are 4
5 delaying marriage until their late 20s and early 30s, few choose not to marry at all. The 6
7 2010 census revealed that by the time they were 34, 93.6% of men and 98.2% of women
8
9 in the PRC had been married (UNDP, 2012). This situation is peculiar to the PRC; the 10
11 comparable figures for the Hong Kong SAR from the 2006 census were 70.8% and 12
13 77.4% respectively, closer to the pattern in other East Asian countries such as South
14
15 Korea and Japan (see UNDP, 2012). In China it may even be seen as preferable to have 16
17 been married and divorced, especially if a child resulted from the marriage, than never to 18
19 have married at all. Certainly most of our mainland Chinese graduate students find the 20
21 choice to remain single unimaginable – even when they are writing doctoral theses
22
23 emphasizing the patriarchal nature of Chinese marriage!
24
25
26
27
28

29 Since marriage “is culturally understood as the rite of passage to adulthood” (Kam, 2013, 30
31 p.6), remaining single carries with it social stigma for both the individuals concerned and 32
33 their families. This stigma is not gender neutral: China is unusual in having a form of 34
35 state-endorsed stigmatization of unmarried women, through the propagation of the idea of 36
37 sheng nü, or leftover women (Hong-Fincher, 2014; To, 2015, Zheng et al., 2016).
38
39

40 Although men are at greater risk of being left single than women, especially poorer and 41
42 rural men, it is women who face most social disapproval. The official definition of sheng
43
44 nü promulgated by the Chinese Ministry of Education (2007) is “urban professional 45
46 women who are over 27 year- old who have high educational level, high salary, high 47
48 intelligence, and attractive appearance, but also overly high expectations for marriage
49
50 partners, and hence are ‘left behind’ in the marriage market” (To, 2015, p.1). The most 51
52 significant aspect of the 2007 official definition, which has been endorsed by the Chinese 53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 government and continuously propagated by the CCP's All-China Women's Federation,
4
5 was that the single women themselves were to blame for being unable to find husbands:
6
7 they overemphasized their career ambitions and professional goals to the detriment of 8
9 their "personal happiness", understood as requiring marriage and motherhood. In line 10
11 with China's paternalistic culture, the government's critique of single professional 12
13 women served as a "benevolent warning" for them not "leave it too late" to find a 14
15 husband and to have children (To, 2015). The sheng nü discourse circulates throughout 16
17 the Chinese media and increases the pressure on women to marry. Men also face pressure
18
19 to marry. Indeed, Confucian norms of filial piety prescribe marriage and fathering 20
21 children as the most important of filial obligations (Evans, 1997). Unmarried, childless
22
23 men and known as "bare branches." The difference is that an urban man with a decent 24
25 income remains marriageable for far longer – he could still be considered a "catch" into 26
27 his forties.
28
29
30
31
32

33
34 Women, however, lose their value in the marriage market once they are past their youth – 35
36 particularly after the age of 30. Since women cannot legally marry until they are aged 20
37
38 and women in higher education are often discouraged from dating until they finish their 39
40 studies, young educated women have only a small window of opportunity in which to 41
42 find a partner. There is also an expectation that they will have their first child before they 43
44 are 30, as it is considered too dangerous to do so later, certainly after the age of 35. This 45
46 concern reflects the emphasis placed on producing a "high quality" child (Zhu, 2010).
47
48 Motherhood is also virtually compulsory: "Childlessness is not read as choice, but as 49
50 pathology: either she or her husband is too sick, too old or just 'too weak'" (Evans, 2002, 51
52 p.348).
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 The ideal sexual citizen, then, does their duty to their family and nation by marrying and
4 producing a child, or now possibly two children – and the vast majority of mainland
5 Chinese citizens comply, although this by no means indicates that their sexual relations
6 are confined within monogamous marriage. Much sexual activity goes on outside
7 marriage, whether in the form of pre-marital sex, same-sex relations or commercial sex.
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17

18 Sexual Diversity and Sexual Minorities: Chinese Tongzhi and *Lala

19
20
21 One effect of the greater freedoms afforded by China's opening up has been the 22 emergence of tongzhi and lala communities in major cities, increasingly visible since the 23 1990s (Kam, 2013; Kong, 2016; Rofel, 2007, 2012). The literal meaning tongzhi is “same 24 will,” the Chinese rendition of “comrade”, and thus has political connotations. The term
25 was used by the founding father of the Republic of China, Sun Yat Sen to refer to 26 comrades in the republican movement, and by the CCP up to the end of the Mao era. It
27 has since been appropriated by Hong Kong and Chinese gay activists as a label of self-
28 identification. Tongzhi can also be used of lesbians, sometimes feminized as nütongzhi, 29 but lesbians in mainland China more often describe themselves as lala (collectively in 30 English usage, lalas). These forms of identification are seen as less stigmatizing than the 31 alternative, tongxinglian, homosexual (Lau et al., 2017).
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47

48 The emergence of these identities, and of same-sex desires as the basis of communities
49 and activism, is relatively recent in China but same-sex practices, here as elsewhere in the 50 world, have a history. Interpreting such histories is problematic, not only because of 51 limited resources, but because of the danger that we read history (whether European or 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Asian) through our own modern understanding of sexual identities (Sang, 2003; Chiang,
4 2010). We cannot, therefore, claim that there were lesbians or homosexuals in the past
5 since those terms would have had no meaning: these categories were relatively modern 6 western inventions with consequences for identities individuals constructed for 7 themselves (Chiang, 2010; Foucault, 1981); similarly, we cannot assume that same-sex
8 desires and practices have the same meaning and same implications everywhere in the 9 world (Kamano & Khor, 2006; Rofel, 2007); we certainly should avoid any “ahistorical
10 desire to project the Chinese onto a the world map of universal sexuality” (Sang, 2003, p.
11 37).

12
13 Bearing in mind these caveats, there is some evidence of the acceptance of same sex
14 eroticism in China, at least among men, up to the 19th century (Hinch, 1990; Louie, 15 2002). Some traces of sexual encounters between women have been found in late 16 imperial literary and documentary sources, although there is some debate about whether 17 women would actually have had the opportunity to pursue such liaisons (Evans, 1997;
18 Sang, 2003). It is generally argued that same-sex eroticism was not condemned in China
19 provided individuals fulfilled the filial and patriarchal obligation to marry and reproduce
20 (Hinch, 1990; Louie, 2002). The introduction of western science in the early 20th century
21 and the translation of early sexological works, especially those of Havelock Ellis,
22 imported the concept of heterosexuality into China (Kong, 2016; McMillan, 2006; Wong, 23 2016). Howard Chiang (2010) argues that this was not a simple appropriation of western 24 ideas, but involved much discussion and contestation associated with what he calls 25 “epistemic modernity”, an apparatus through which, and at a particular historical 26 moment, “a new science of sexuality gained epistemological grounding in China”
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 (p.631). Unlike those, including Sang (2003), who maintain that homosexuality was not,
4 in early 20th century China, seen as the basis of individual identity and those who place
5 the origins of a Chinese 'scientia sexualis' in the postsocialist period, Chiang
6 convincingly demonstrates that both emerged in the Republican era. He thus places the 7 creation of the homosexual, as a category of person, earlier than many other scholars and 8 offers a detailed analysis of the conditions that gave rise to it. His conclusion, however 9 could be endorsed by many, even if their time frame differs: "as little as a century ago,
10 the question of sexual identity did not even fall within the parameters of Chinese thinking
11 – for in China there is no such thing as homosexuality outside epistemic modernity" 12 (p.650).

13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Homosexuality has never been categorically illegal in China. In the Mao era there was no official mention of homosexuality; "it was assumed not to exist", but "official silence masked a widespread view of homosexuality as a violation of the natural heterosexual order" (Evans, 1997, p.206). In the post-Mao era, homosexuality continued to be understood in terms of the biomedical model. In 1978 it was defined as a sexual disorder in the first version of the Chinese Classification of Mental Disorders (CCMD). Gay men and some lesbians were vulnerable to arrest and administrative detention under the catch-all crime of "hooliganism" (liumang zui). Homosexuality has since been implicitly de-criminalized by the deletion of hooliganism from law in 1997 and de-medicalized by being removed from the list of mental illnesses in 2001 (Gao, 1995; Kong, 2016; Wu, 2003).

The revival of science and social science in the reform era did make it possible to begin research on homosexual life. The earliest studies of homosexuality in the reform era (e.g.

1
2
3 Li & Wang, 1992) were of male homosexuals only and conducted from a biomedical
4
5 framework, positioning homosexuals as “other” to both authors and readers (Kam, 2013;
6
7 Kong, 2016). Increasingly, with the official recognition of the existence of male
8
9 homosexuals in 2003 due to the AIDS epidemic, biomedical approaches were 10
11 increasingly reconceptualized within a public health framework, with gay men being seen 12
13 as an ‘at risk’ and risk engendering group (Kong, 2016; Wong, 2016). In associating
14
15 homosexuality with HIV/AIDS, the state’s public health agenda further stigmatized
16
17 homosexuals and provided a rationale for authorities to arrest and harass them (Kam, 18
19 2013; Wong, 2015). It also, however, led to funding for NGOs providing support 20
21 services, while organizing around HIV and AIDS helped build a tongzhi community. This 22
23 effectively retained the focus on male homosexuals, privileged them in terms of funding 24
25 relative to lesbians and also contributed to the lesser visibility of lesbians.
26
27
28
29
30

31
32 The development of queer communities and activism from the 1990s, along with the 33
34 production of queer film, literature and other cultural productions (e.g. Bao, 2015, 2016b; 35
36 Chan, 2017; Sang, 2003) began to attract attention from a new generation of scholars.
37
38 These researchers, influenced by western social and cultural theory and qualitative 39
40 methodologies, were less concerned with seeing homosexuality as a problem and more
41
42 interested in understanding the everyday life experience of lesbians and gay men. More 43
44 sociological literature has explored the development of gay and lesbian identities
45
46 lifestyles and the wider sociocultural context in which particular sexualities are 47
48 constructed (e.g. Kam, 2013; Rofel, 2007; Zheng, 2015). Gay male behavior, however, 49
50 continued to receive far more attention than that of lesbians partly, but not only, because 51
52 of its association with HIV transmission. Much of this research has been undertaken by 53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 gay male overseas Chinese and Hong Kong scholars (e.g. Cho, 2010; Kong, 2010, 2012, 4 2015, 2016; Suen, 2015, 2016). Although lala lives are less well documented, there are 5 now ethnographical works on lalas in Shanghai (Kam, 1993) and Beijing (Engebretsen, 6 2014) and lesbians in Hong Kong (Tang, 2011).

7
8
9
10
11
12
13 Within mainland China, the scope lalas and tongzhi have for organizing and meeting is 14 narrow. While they can make creative use of public space using dramatic strategies such 15 as staging “gay weddings” (Bao, 2016a), sexual minority communities are generally only 16 tolerated if they keep a low profile and do not engage in overt activism. Although gay 17 men and lesbians have created new sexual spaces for themselves, these spaces are always 18 under surveillance and are often raided and closed down (Kong, 2011; Rofel, 2010).

19
20
21
22
23
24
25 Although the public health concern had opened up political space for LGBTQ groups,
26 their services concentrate heavily on health-related programs and their scope of freedom
27 is strictly delimited by authorities (Cao & Guo, 2016). In order to gain legitimacy, they 28 have to adopt a “non-confrontational” approach and strategically collaborate with the 29 government (Cao & Guo, 2016, p.507).

30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39 As part of the Party-state’s moral agenda (Sigely, 2006), public display of homosexuality
40 is seen as potentially destabilizing. In 2004 the CCP launched “a campaign to clear
41 violent and sexual content from the media” (Tu & Lee, 2014, p.984). Homosexual topics
42 were banned because they were seen as being “against the healthy way of life in China,” 43 and “[i]n 2009, more than 10 gay web sites in China reportedly were forced to close or 44 had their accounts deleted by their server hosting companies due to pressure from the 45 authorities” (Tu & Lee, 2014, p.984). A worrisome recent development is that the new 46 NGO law introduced in 2016 has further restricted NGOs’ capacity for political 47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 resistance. Now foreign NGOs must “register with the Ministry of Public Security and
4 allow the police to scrutinize all aspects of their operations, including finances, at any
5 time” and “must not undermine or damage China's national interests” (McBride, 2017, 6 n.p.).
7
8
9
10
11

12
13 The potential for political activism is also hampered by inequalities within LGBTQ 14 communities. LGBTQ individuals differ in terms of their origins, class, and lifestyles, 15 and then group themselves in accordance with these demarcations (Wang, 2015). For 16 example, urban tongzhi differentiate themselves from rural tongzhi; middle class tongzhi
17 differentiate themselves from “money boys” (male sex-workers); young tongzhi
18 differentiate themselves from old tongzhi. The intersectionality of these identities (e.g. a 19 rural money boy who has low social status and education) can result in exclusion even 20 within LGBTQ communities for those seen as “bad gays” (Wang, 2015, p.111).
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30

31 Moreover, sexual minorities are not always non-conformist. LGBTQ identities can be 32 complicated by the political differentiation between respectable and bad citizens (Wong, 33 2015). The idea of suzhi (quality) refers to such a hierarchy, as those who restrict their 34 performance of LGBTQ identities to the private sphere and yet behave publicly as a 35 respectable citizen can gain a certain degree of tolerance (Wong, 2015). Rofel reports that 36 the term suzhi (quality) was widely used among the gay men she met to distinguish
37 themselves from less educated and cosmopolitan gay men, in particular money boys
38 from rural origins who were seen as “polluting” their culture (Rofel, 2007, p.104).
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49

50
51 As this contempt for money boys indicates, sex work is one manifestation of inequalities
52 within the tongzhi community. Working as a money boy provides a means by which a 53 young rural gay man without resources can move to the city in the hope of opportunities 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 for sex with men and finding a community of like others (Kong, 2012; Rofel, 2010;
4
5 Zheng, 2015). The clientele of money boys are wealthier privileged urban men. Zheng
6
7 (2015) found that red-collar (party member) and gold-collar (rich) tongzhi preferred
8
9 commercial sexual transactions with money boys to forming sexual-romantic 10
11 relationships with other men, which they saw as placing them at greater risk of disclosure 12
13 and social disgrace. Zheng links this phenomenon, and the differential privileges among 14
15 tongzhi on which it depends, to the neoliberal ethos of modern China rooted in the state
16
17 ideology that “prizes economic profits, individual responsibilities, and free choice” (p.
18
19 97). Through buying sex on the one hand and forming a heterosexual family on the 20
21 other, these successful wealthy or powerful tongzhi manage to construct themselves as 22
23 normal postsocialist subjects in accord with the neoliberal logic (Zheng, 2015). Gold and 24
25 red-collar tongzhi, as the beneficiaries and positive models of the postsocialist neoliberal 26
27 ideology, reinforce their grasp on power through the capitals they possess. Money boys, 28
29 at the other end of the hierarchy, experience inequalities but also hope to become “normal 30
31 citizens” by providing sexual services. In between the two, the graduated internal 32
33 stratification of tongzhi community is also visible through different levels of leisure
34
35 venues and gay bars (Rofel, 2007; Zheng, 2015).
36
37
38
39
40
41
42

43 The desire to achieve “normality” to be “as normal as possible” among both tongzhi and 44
45 lalas is understandable given the constraints they face (see Yau, 2010). This has given 46
47 rise to two key issues for academics, activists and tongzhi and lalas in general. The first 48
49 of these is the extent to which “global” (generally western-led) gay strategies and 50
51 identities are applicable in the Chinese context. The second is dealing with the pressure to 52
53 marry. The two are interrelated in that they are a response to the importance of the filial 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 obligation to marry and how this affects the relationships gay men and lesbians have with 4
5 their natal families.
6
7

8 Managing the marriage problem 9

10
11 “Coming out” to friends, colleagues and especially family is an important part of the gay 12
13 life narrative in western societies (Plummer, 1995). This is often seen as essential to 14
15 being “true to oneself”, honest and authentic. It may therefore not be a move of such 16
17 importance in a society with a more relational understanding of selfhood. It is also 18
19 sometimes seen as too confessional and confrontational to be appropriate in Chinese 20
21 societies (see Chou, 2000; Kong, 2016). While it is important to recognize the cultural 22
23 specificity of Chinese societies and avoid assuming some universal gay identity and 24
25 community into which tongzhi might fit, there are problems with a non-confrontational
26
27 adaptation to the status quo, particularly if it contributes to the invisibility and silencing
28
29 of those with non-normative sexualities (Kam, 2013; Liu & Ding, 2005). This approach 30
31 has been characterized as “reticent politics” (Liu & Ding, 2005) and more scathingly “the 32
33 politics of public correctness” (Kam, 2013 p.89).
34
35
36
37
38
39

40 One influential and controversial proponent of this political stance is the Hong Kong
41
42 scholar Chou Wah-Shan. Chou argues that in Chinese societies “coming home” is more 43
44 appropriate than “coming out” (Chou, 2000). He refers to a Chinese tradition of silently
45
46 tolerating, rather than openly accepting, same-sex sexuality; this tradition, with its 47
48 emphasis on harmony is said to be quite distinct from the virulent homophobia evident in 49
50 western societies. It now, he maintains, enables tongzhi to introduce their partners into 51
52 the family circle and have them accepted without fully acknowledging the nature of their 53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 relationship. While Chou might be correct in identifying certain forms of homophobia as
4 peculiarly western, there are a number of problems with his argument. First, as Liu Jen-
5 peng & Ding Naifei (2005, pp.32-33) note, it collapses thousands of years of Chinese 6 history into a homogenous “tradition” and, moreover, “claiming to enlarge the space of 7 survival for queer persons in the present by invoking a homophobic free site in some 8 idealized pre-colonial past...too easily slips into the service of residual disciplinary 9 forces” and serves to maintain the “normal order.”

10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20 The picture of the harmonious, tolerant Chinese family that Chou (2000) presents is 21 contestable; some Chinese families, no doubt, do extend tolerance and acceptance to their
22 LGBT members, but most do not do so. It is argued that, even if it exists, silent tolerance 23 constitutes a form of symbolic violence whereby the existence of tongzhi and lalas is 24 erased (Engebretsen, 2014; Kam, 2013; Liu & Ding, 2005). Writing primarily of Hong
25 Kong and Taiwan, Liu & Ding (2005) argue that it condemns sexually dissident 26 individuals to the shadowy spaces of what they call “the socio-familial continuum” and 27 allots them “the responsibility (at their expense) for the upkeep and of the wholeness and 28 harmony of the very continuum wherein they do not have a place” (p.32). In mainland
29 China the forces that keep tongzhi and lalas in the shadows are much stronger.

30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44 Lalas and tongzhi do need some way of managing their relationships with both lovers and 45 their wider families. Given that conformity and fitting in are so central to Chinese culture
46 and that marriage is virtually mandatory, many tongzhi and lalas marry, either in a 47 heterosexual marriage or a what has been variously termed a “nominal”, “contract”,
48 “cooperative” or “performative” marriage in which a lesbian and gay man contract a 49 marriage to maintain a public facade of heterosexuality while continuing with their 50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 alternative lifestyles (Choi & Luo 2016; Engebretsen, 2017; Liu, 2013). In Chinese, this 4 is usually referred as a “marriage of convenience” or “xinghun” (Liu, 2013, p.495). Such 5 marriages have been facilitated not just by the existence of tongzhi communities in 6 Chinese cities, but by the internet, which has become increasingly important in 7 connecting sexual minorities in China (Liu, 2013; Wong, 2015) and providing a platform
8 for advertisements for marriage partners (e.g. Tianya.cn) (Liu, 2013).
9

10
11
12 One of the main reasons for entering into such a marriage is to please parents. This is not
13 simply a matter of parents’ personal desires; as Choi & Luo (2016) note, parents face
14 gossip and disapproval from others in their family and community if their offspring 15 remain unmarried, which intensifies the pressure on their lesbian and gay children.
16

17
18 Among the Shanghai lalas featured in Kam’s study, marriage was the single biggest 19 source of stress in their lives. Many were already married and most considered marriage
20 unavoidable – there simply was no option. Those who were unmarried experienced 21 constant pressure from parents and mostly agreed to matchmaking and blind dates
22 organized for them in order to appear heterosexual. Those who were married faced other 23 problems: they found themselves leading double lives and had difficulties making time
24 and space to see their girlfriends (Kam, 2013).
25
26

27
28 In this context it is easy to see why cooperative marriage might seem an attractive
29 alternative. Among the tongzhi and lalas interviewed by Choi & Luo (2016) in Northern 30 China, such a marriage was seen by most as acting out “a well-intentioned and largely 31 harmless lie to make their parents happy” (p.266), though a minority thought the strategy
32 too risky. Although cooperative marriage exemplifies the agency of sexual minorities in 33 a hegemonic heterosexual social environment, and some commentators have suggested 34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 that cooperative marriage households might become a semi-public sphere for the 4 development of a “queer kinship network” (Wong, 2015, p.735), the public performance
5 of heterosexual norms can indeed strengthen the mainstream gender hierarchy (Wong,
6 2015). Due to the purpose of cooperative marriage, gay men usually want their lesbian 7 partners to possess feminine qualities and lesbians often require their male partners to be
8 appropriately masculine (e.g. financially independent) (Liu, 2013; Wong, 2015).
9

10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 There were predictions that the Chinese government would legalize same-sex marriage,
19 since this might be an effective means of gaining international recognition for advancing
20 human rights without significant domestic political costs (Hildebrandt, 2011). This now
21 seems unlikely. Even if same sex marriage were to be legalized it might not immediately
22 solve the problem. The tongzhi that Zheng (2015) met in Dalian found the idea alien.
23 They did not support gay marriage and could not imagine availing themselves of it even 24 if it was a possibility – they would not want to announce their “deviance” by marrying
25 their lovers. While some tongzhi in China do support and campaign for gay marriage
26 (Choi & Luo, 2016) there seems, in any case, little hope of it happening in the near future
27 given the politics of the current regime. The paradoxical nature of cooperative marriage
28 in the Chinese context is that this strategic response to the hegemonic cultural order can 29 contribute to its continued legitimacy, particularly in the context of a regime that is 30 increasingly using the Confucian political imagination to justify its authoritarian rule.
31 This strategy has political consequences.
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49

50
51 Most analyses of co-operative marriage have not framed this sexual choice in political 52 terms, but simply emphasize the “near universal imperative” to marry (Engebretson, 2017
53 p.163). Engebretson’s account is based upon two case studies of contract marriage 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 (xinghun) and online advertisements for partners and focuses on how such marriages are 4
5 contracted and their potential pitfalls:
6
7

8 ... a xinghun marriage seeks to perform compliance with the social and familial order
9
10 by faking marriage and therefore requires, strict, ongoing compartmentalization
11
12 between a secret (or tacitly open) lesbian/gay personal life and the heteronormative
13
14 social façade (pp.163-164).
15
16

17
18 She maintains that this is seen as more appropriate than same-sex marriage for Chinese 19
20 gays men and lesbians, representing an ideal compromise between personal desire and 21
22 social and family duty. This choice fits with the desire of individuals to be normal. But,
23
24 as her case studies reveal: “The xinghun strategy, rather than resolving pressure, 25
26 generates post-marriage complications that reaffirm the dominance of the 27
28 heteronormative family” (Engebretson, 2017, p.164). Pressures to marry not only weigh 29
30 more heavily (and earlier) on women than men, but so do pressures after marriage. As 31
32 Engebretsen (2017) points out, lesbians may experience more difficulties after marriage
33
34 as responsibility for maintaining good relationships with parents and in-laws rests with 35
36 the wife, in addition to entertaining visitors and caring responsibilities. Moreover the 37
38 problems do not end there. Couples in xinghun marriage face their own and their parents’
39
40 desire for children and fear of raising them outside heteronormative family. In other 41
42 words, Engebretson recognizes that co-operative marriage is an attempt to subvert or 43
44 modify prevailing norms, but argues that “success can only be relative and temporary”
45
46 (pp.177-178). At best, this will allow people to buy time to potentially work out a better
47
48 future.
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Engebretsen (2017) cites Wang Yingyi's (2016) MPhil thesis as "a compelling analysis
4 of xinghun arrangements, including what Wang considers a new ethics of lesbian-gay
5 solidarity as a result of such conjugal cooperation" (p.181) but does not take up this issue.
6
7
8
9
10 Wang's thesis does highlight many problems in cooperative marriages but suggests that 11 where it works and is amicable and egalitarian it can provide a new way of living gay 12 lives. The question remains as to whether this is "queering" the institution of 13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

China's Sexual Marketplace

The place of non-normative sexualities in China raises some rather different issues in the case of commercial sex. It is most certainly seen as "deviant" in terms of China's "socialist morality," yet there is considerable evidence indicating that it is thoroughly integrated into the fabric of Chinese society. The sex-trade has received a great deal of attention from both Chinese and overseas scholars (Ding, 2012, 2016; Ding & Ho 2008, 2013; Jeffreys, 2004, 2012; Jiang, et al., 2012; Pan et al., 2011; Wen et al., 2013; Zheng 2009, 2011). This body of work provides further means of analyzing the complex interconnections between cultural, political, economic, interpersonal and personal life in modern China, raising interesting issues about the politics of sexuality and its place within the neoliberal market economy.

In a cultural environment where familial values are seen as the foundation of social harmony, it is not surprising that China's laws and policies are not friendly to the sex industry and that sex-workers experience restrictions on their freedom to the detriment of

1
2
3 their wellbeing (Boittin, 2013; Chin & Finckenauer, 2012; Jeffreys, 2004). Prostitution
4 was officially outlawed soon after the establishment of the PRC and was rigorously
5 suppressed during the Mao era. From the beginning of the reform era, however,
6
7 commercial sex has flourished despite its continued illegality. Since the 1980s China has 8 shifted to control and regulation of commercial sex rather than attempting to eradicate it
9
10 (Gil & Anderson, 1998; Ren, 1999). Since the sex industry is often associated with 11 corruption (Leung, 2015; Osburg, 2016), it has been subject to periodic crackdowns in 12 recent years associated with Xi's anti-corruption campaign. Yet it is usually low end
13 prostitution that is targeted and authorities often turn a blind eye to where corruption
14 more usually occurs – in the high end private clubs catering to the party and business elite.
15
16 Attempts to suppress the sex industry are generally sporadic and are usually soon
17 abandoned. The reason is simple: despite its outlawed status and the public stigmatization
18 of sex-workers, commercial sex is not a fringe activity in China. We will argue it is, in 19 fact, essential to China's economic prosperity and integral to its business practices.
20
21 Before elaborating on this, it is first necessary to consider what research tells us about the 22 complex, segmented and highly stratified sexual marketplace.
23
24

25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41 This sexual marketplace caters for clients from the richest to the poorest sections of 42 society and draws its service providers from a range of social backgrounds. Yet most of 43 the extensive literature on sex work has focused almost exclusively on a particular 44 category of female sex workers, those who sell sex in brothels and similar establishments.
45
46 Additionally, much research on sex work in China has been preoccupied with its 47 problematic aspects. Aside from social stigmatization (Wong, Holroyd, & Bingham, 48 2011), female sex workers have been closely associated with AIDS, with the emphasis 49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 primarily on lower class prostitutes and their clients rather than considering how sexual 4
5 practices higher up the social ladder might contribute to HIV transmission (see Uretsky,
6
7 2016). There is, therefore a copious literature on the health risks and health needs
8
9 associated with commercial sex (e.g. Cheng, Han & Huang, 2010; Choi, 2010; Tucker, 10
11 Ren & Sapio, 2010). Other issues that have received considerable attention are sex 12
13 workers' vulnerability to violence (Li, 2012) their quality of life and psychological 14
15 wellbeing (Jiang et al., 2012; Wen, Hao & Hong, 2013); subjective well-being (Monk-16
17 Turner & Turner, 2010) and the psychological stressors to which they are subject (Zhang
18
19 et al., 2015). In research produced within China, aside from a few exceptions (e.g. Ding, 20
21 2016), sex workers are often considered as a problematic group waiting to be "rescued" 22
23 or "rehabilitated." Thus, academic researchers collude with the state's public health
24
25 discourse to construct an image of sex workers as a source of social harm. In other words, 26
27 the stigmatization of sex workers comes not only from the state, but also from the 28
29 Chinese research community.
30
31
32
33
34
35

36 There is no doubt that women sex workers do face a number of threats to their health,
37
38 safety and well-being as well as structural constraints and inequalities, especially those at 39
40 the bottom end of the hierarchy. They also, however, have agency and reflexive self-41
42 understanding which cannot be fully captured by structural analysis or by only 43
44 considering the problematic aspects of the sex trade. It is increasingly recognized that it
45
46 is important to understand how sex workers actively negotiate, or even take advantage of,
47
48 seemingly oppressive structural conditions (Cheung, 2013; Ding, 2012, 2016; Ho et al., 49
50 2013; Yuen et al., 2014; Zhai, 2013).
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 It is also essential to take account of the diversity within the sex industry, since those 4
5 working within it do so under differing conditions and in a wide variety of settings in the 6
7 sex industry, entertainment industry and beauty industry (Ding & Ho, 2008, 2013; Tsang,
8
9 2017a, 2017b; Tsang & Lee, 2013). Literature in the area has expanded to cover a highly 10
11 diversified range of transactions, services and actors involved in a variety of 12
13 establishments including hair salons, saunas, foot massage and massage parlors, karaoke 14
15 clubs, bars and hotels. Sex workers include and service those with different sexualities;
16
17 sex work is not just about female sex workers (Kong, 2012), although it is women and 18
19 their male clients who have received the most academic attention. Male sex workers most 20
21 often appear in research on tongzhi communities (e.g. Zheng, 2015).
22
23
24
25

26
27 Moreover, sex workers' self-understanding varies depending on their position in the 28
29 sexual division of labor. While the term 'sex-work' was introduced in the West as an 30
31 alternative to the stigmatizing connotations of "prostitution", some Chinese women
32
33 involved in commercial sexual transactions resist this label; rather than accepting it as de-
34
35 stigmatizing, they see it as reducing their work to sex and failing to acknowledge the 36
37 emotional and other types of labor that their occupation involves and prefer to be called 38
39 "xiaojie" (Ding et al., 2013). Literally xiaojie means "young lady" and used to be a polite
40
41 form of address to young women, before becoming almost exclusively used in mainland
42
43 China in relation to commercial sex.
44
45
46

47
48 Many of China's sex workers, male and female, are internal migrants, moving from rural 49
50 areas to urban centers, like the women in Ding's (2013, 2016) study of the Pearl River
51
52 Delta area. For such women, sex work is seen as providing better prospects than long 53
54 hours, poor working conditions and low pay in factories or as domestic servants; the work
55
56
57

1
2
3 is much more lucrative and more flexible (Choi, 2011a; Liu, 2011). It also enables them
4
5 to see themselves as “modern” women embracing a “cosmopolitan” lifestyle in contrast
6
7 to the “backward” rural areas from which many of them originate (Ding & Ho, 2008).
8
9
10 They thus buy into the new subjectivities offered by the neoliberal ethos associated with 11
12 China’s modernization project. Some Chinese sex-workers pursue their dreams of social 13
14 advancement by moving abroad. Every year, thousands of Chinese women travel to other 15
16 Asian countries and the United States in order to engage in commercial sex work and 17
18 other types of sexual labor in locations where it is more lucrative than in China. Most 19
20 migrant sex-workers travel of their own volition rather than being victims of trafficking
21
22 or sexual slaves (Agustín, 2007). While there are many individuals and agencies involved
23
24 in “the sex trade supply chain” (Wong et al., 2010), such as pimps, agents, mommies, 25
26 escort agency owners, brothel owners, and drivers, migrant sex workers are not always 27
28 helpless victims. The social, economic, and political organization of the transnational sex
29
30 trade is far more complex than admitted by the “moral crusaders” of the human 31
32 trafficking world (Chin & Finckenauer, 2012). It is nonetheless the case that this 33
34 movement, like labor migration in general, is fueled by the gap between richer and poorer 35
36 regions and countries.
37
38
39
40
41
42

43 There is little research on sex tourism in China or on Chinese men abroad, but a few 44
45 studies indicate that it certainly exists. For example, the South-Western province of 46
47 Yunnan often attracts sex-tourists because, in Han Chinese men’s imagination, its ethnic 48
49 minority women are thought to be exotically alluring and sexually liberated (Otis, 2016a).
50
51 Taiwanese men travel to China in search of sexual services, or access sexual services
52
53 when travelling for business (Chen, 2017; Shen, 2008, 2014). The working-class 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Taiwanese men who feature in Chen's (2017) study were motivated to visit Southern
4 China for a number of reasons. Sexual services were cheaper there and they could afford
5 to frequent a better class of establishment than would be possible for them at home. In 6 this environment a man who was relatively low in status and power could play with a
7 different kind of masculinity, being "a big man" or a "big lover" (p.930). The men also 8 reported better sex than they received either from Taiwanese sex-workers or their wives
9 and girlfriends.

10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20 There are other indicators of male travelers' access to commercial sexual services in the 21 literature: foreigners and overseas Chinese as well as visiting businessmen were found to 22 be among the clientele of a high-end karaoke bar in Dongguan (Tsang, 2017a). Rich
23 Chinese businessmen and influential officials travelling within the country can expect
24 their hosts to provide them with sexual companionship (Uretsky, 2016). When they travel
25 abroad these men also commonly exploit sexual services in poorer, more peripheral
26 countries (Chang & Chen, 2012). This may not occur in the context of sex-tourism per se
27 but as part of business travel (see Hoang, 2015), which, in the context of globalized
28 commercial networks is helping to fuel the growth of the international sex trade
29 (Bernstein, 2007b, p.4).

30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44 Sex workers within China are not all poorly educated rural migrants; in higher end
45 establishments workers are less likely to be from humble backgrounds. Inasmuch as there
46 are many types of sex workers, there are also varieties of sexual services and sexualized
47 labor from straightforward sexual transactions to those purveyed by escorts, hostesses
48 and masseuses, some of who might also sell sex. They frequently provide emotional labor,
49 romantic entanglements and "bounded authenticity" as temporary girlfriends (Bernstein,
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 2007a; Tsang, 2017a). There are also those that the feminist economist He Qinglian
4 labels “grey women” (huise nüxing), who form relationships with wealthy men (as cited
5 in Osburg, 2013). Such women occupy a position between the respectable “white” world
6 and the “black” world of prostitution and distance themselves from sex workers because 7 they are often well educated and their relationships with their wealthy patrons involve far
8 more than sex (Uretsky, 2016; Zurndorfer, 2016). These “grey women” fit into the top
9 three levels of prostitution (out of a seven-tiered hierarchy) codified by the Chinese
10 police (Jeffreys, 2004; Zurndorfer, 2016).
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21

22 The first tier, ernai (second wife), is akin to a mistress. She is usually provided with an
23 apartment, an income and gifts in return for sex, companionship and sometimes wifely 24 domestic services. Many Chinese businessmen (including those from Hong Kong and 25 Taiwan) retain the services of an ernai (Osburg, 2013; Shen 2008, 2014; Uretsky, 2016;
26 Zhang, 2011). Those attached to wealthy Chinese or overseas businessmen are usually 27 young and well educated – white collar workers or students. This is not the case with all
28 ernai. Through her ethnographic research in Ningbo and Guangzhou, Xiao (2011)
29 demonstrates that their social backgrounds vary. It is common for “second wives” of 30 Hong Kong men working in China, such as truck drivers, to be rural migrants to urban 31 regions. The second tier, baopo (hired wife), accompanies her patron on business trips
32 and to entertainment venues and is paid according to an agreed-upon rate for each period.
33 Being seen with a young and attractive woman can give a rich man “face” (mianzi).
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50 (Burger, 2012)
51
52

53 The third level, santing (three halls) or sanpei (three companies), includes women who 54 work as hostesses in karaoke bars, dance halls, bars, restaurants, and teahouses. They are 55
56
57

1
2
3 paid, sometimes in the form of commission, by the establishment for which they work
4
5 and receive “tips” from men for singing, dancing or drinking with them – and if they 6
7 leave with them and offer “special services” (see Burger, 2012; Osburg, 2013; Uretsky,
8
9 2016; Zheng, 2012). These kinds of establishments are also stratified, catering to clients 10
11 with varying incomes. Hostesses in these establishments offer much more than sex, 12
13 especially in the top end bars, where they are expected to converse with elite men. In her
14
15 study of a high end bar in Dongguan, Eileen Tsang (2017) found that men wanted to 16
17 establish a degree of genuine intimacy with the workers, and sometimes longer term
18
19 relationships. The women were primarily well educated and put some effort into 20
21 presenting themselves as sophisticated and cosmopolitan, reading and keeping up to date
22
23 with current affairs and finding out what their clients liked.
24
25
26
27
28

29 Workers in the four lower levels of the commercial sex hierarchy are more obviously 30
31 exchanging sexual services for money. These are dingdong girls (doorbell girls) who 32
33 work in hotels as prostitutes, fangmei (working in bath houses, foot massage parlors, 34
35 hair salons etc.), jienu (those who work on the streets), and xiagongpei (women who 36
37 engage in paid sex with China's transient male workers) (Zurndorfer, 2016). The variety
38
39 of forms that transactions take within China's sexual economy is indicative of the ways in 40
41 which it is interwoven with wider socio-economic relations.
42
43
44
45
46
47
48

49 The Political Economy of the Sex Industry

50
51
52 The global restructuring of capitalist production and investment that has taken place in 53
54 China since its opening up has had consequences for commercial sex that are far more 55
56
57

1
2
3 profound than most sociologists and sexologists ever choose to consider. The scale of the 4 sexual economy in China is huge. “According to the World Health Organization, China
5 has the largest commercial sex workforce in the world, with an estimated 10 million men
6 and women so employed – more than 300,000 in the city of Beijing alone” (Zurndorfer,
7 2016, p.9). Guan Qingyou, an economist with Minsheng Securities, estimated that the sex
8 industry in China contributes $164 billion annually to the national economy (as cited in 9 Guo, 2014). Following a crackdown on the sex trade in Dongguan in 2014, The 10 Economist (2014), drawing on Chinese sources, reported that prostitution generated 10%
11 of the city’s GDP. In China as a whole it has been claimed that prostitution contributes 6-
12 8% of China's annual GDP (Burger, 2012). Given that sex workers need taxis, clothing,
13 cell phones, apartments, and cosmetics, many other sectors of the economy are connected
14 to and benefit from sex work, making it a cornerstone of the economy (Burger, 2012).

15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 The contribution that commercial sex makes to the economy is politically significant
32 because China’s growing economic growth and prosperity is vital source of the CCP’s
33 legitimacy. In addition to the substantial revenues generated directly and indirectly by the 34 market for commercial sex, the sexual economy plays an important role in facilitating 35 business deals (Osburg, 2013, 2016; Uretsky, 2016) and providing a means for the 36 survival of those, such as migrant workers, who find it hard to earn enough to support
37 themselves and their families by other means (Choi, 2011b; Liu, 2011). Higher up the 38 social scale it provides educated women with a means of enhancing their social and 39 cultural capital (Tsang, 2017b), which might enable them, when they move on from sex
40 work, to improve their economic situation. The sexual economy thus serves multiple 41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 purposes from contributing to the wider economy to providing a living for those who
4
5 work in it.
6
7

8
9 Given that continued economic growth and prosperity is essential to maintaining the 10
11 legitimacy of the party-state, it is not surprising that past attempts during the reform era
12
13 to limit it have failed. While sporadic campaigns against prostitution (“sweeping yellow”)
14
15 may serve to bolster the legitimacy of the Party-state in seemingly upholding “socialist 16
17 morality” (Sevastopulo, 2014; Shao, 2014), the government cannot afford to do too much 18
19 damage to China’s expanding economy and its standing in the world. This is why 20
21 crackdowns are selective, directed against the more visible lower end of the sexual 22
23 market so that establishments serving the elite survive. For example, it is reported that in 24
25 the “sweeping yellow” exercise in Dongguan in 2014, “the high end bars and hotels, 26
27 whose owners have close ‘political’ connections with the police and local governments, 28
29 emerged unscathed” (Tsang, 2017b, p.452). Where campaigns aim higher up the social 30
31 scale, they usually target the leadership’s political opponents; accusations of corruption 32
33 are often politically motivated (Ko & Weng, 2012).
34
35
36
37
38

39
40 The paradoxical nature of the sex industry in China is that both crackdowns on it and the 41
42 sustaining of it contribute, directly or indirectly, to the legitimacy of the Party-state and 43
44 thus to maintaining social stability. Understanding this paradox is essential to explain
45
46 why China’s sex industry continues to flourish despite the repressive apparatus of the 47
48 Chinese state. Nonetheless, until very recently there has been little attention paid to the 49
50 relationship between the sexual and wider economy or to the political utility of sex work
51
52 for the legitimacy of the government. In order to understand the contradictions between 53
54 China’s laws (anti-prostitution) and practices (loose implementation), it is necessary to 55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 examine the raison d'être of the sexual industry – how both the political system and the 4 political economy gain from it. There are some recent studies that begin to cast light on 5 the contradictions between public morality and the political utility of the sexual economy
6 by exploring the links between high end commercial sex, business practices and Party-
7 state oversight and regulation of the economy (Osburg, 2013, 2016; Zheng 2015;
8 Uretsky, 2016). We now turn to consider these studies in some detail given the 9 importance of their findings and analyses, which not only illuminate the ways in which 10 sexualized labor is integrated into China's political and economic life also much about 11 Chinese understandings of masculinity and the intersections between gender, sexuality
12 and class.

23 24 25 26 27 Elite men, sexual consumption and Chinese business practices

28
29
30 The interest in elite men's consumption of sexual services and its integration into 31 business practices is understandable given how it ties in with the much-researched issue
32 of guanxi (Barbalet, 2017; Bian & Zhang, 2014; Yang, 2002; Qi, 2013). It also reveals 33 much about the political and economic utility of sex-work to the Chinese establishment.
34
35 Guanxi, literally "relationships", involves networks of reciprocal bonds of support and 36 trust between individuals, which are essential to doing business in China. Guanxi
37 networks are also implicated in the corruption underpinning much wealth generation in 38 China (Osburg, 2016), although guanxi should not simply be equated with corrupt
39 practices (see Barbelet, 2017; Yang, 2002). The ritualized process of business
40 entertaining through which guanxi is cultivated is known as yingchou. The provision of 41 sexual services has become so much part of yingchou that it can be said that "the guanxi
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 machine is now oiled with the bodies of women who serve as mediators providing the 4
5 glue that finally binds relations” (Uretsky, 2016, p. 45).
6
7

8
9 Sexualized entertainment has long been noted as an established part of East Asian 10
11 business culture (Allison, 1994; Hoang, 2015; Lee, 2008) and found its way into China 12
13 from the 1990s as part of the economic reform and “opening up” to global markets (Liu, 14
15 2002; Otis, 2012; Yang, 2002). Much of this takes place in karaoke (KTV) clubs, which 16
17 were originally imported into China by Japanese businessmen (Zheng, 2012) and have 18
19 come to play a key role in the “nightly carousing with business partners, mistresses, and 20
21 paid hostesses that dominates the after work lives of most businessmen in China”
22
23 (Osburg, 2016, p.163). The pattern of such evenings out generally includes a banquet, 24
25 with copious amounts of alcohol consumed in rounds of toasts and then moving on to 26
27 private rooms in a KTV club or bar in the company of hostesses, sometime supplemented 28
29 by visits to other venues where sexual services are available such as saunas or massage 30
31 parlors. While interactions with hostesses are very sexualized, these women do not 32
33 explicitly sell sex but can, and often do, offer a “special service” off site. In any case, 34
35 men frequently end such evenings in the company of a sex-worker, whether a hostess, 36
37 masseuse or a woman summoned to their hotel room.
38
39
40
41
42
43

44 Elite men’s sexual consumption practices have been attributed to a reaction to Maoist
45
46 repression, said to have produced a feeling of emasculation in men, or simply as a result
47
48 of men’s increased sexual freedom in the reform era. Tiantian Zheng (2012) seems to 49
50 endorse the former view when she says that “men remembered the Maoist era as an era of 51
52 emasculation” (p.658) and that they “claim sexual consumption as a weapon against the 53
54 socialist state” (p.662), a form of rebellion against and freedom from state control.
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Osburg (2013, 2016) contests this view, arguing that these men's activities have more to 4 do with cementing homosocial bonds and business relationships than a reaction against 5 past Maoist oppression. Men might see their activities as a rebellious practices, but we 6 are more inclined to Osburg's view, which is more in tune with that of Uretsky (2016).
7
8 All three researchers concur, however, in linking men's behavior to the performance of a
9 particular form of masculinity. The ethnographic studies conducted by these three 10 researchers reveal the complexity of the social relations in which and through which elite 11 men's consumption of commercial sex occurs, but differ in their analyses of the socio-12 political context.
13
14

15
16
17 The pictures of elite sexual consumption painted by these three ethnographers have many 18 features in common; the differences of emphasis and interpretation among them arise
19 from their varied research interests, the regions in which they conducted their research
20 and their own gendered locations. Of the three, Zheng (2006, 2007, 2009, 2012) is the 21 most concerned with sex work per se and has written extensively on the subject.
22
23

24
25 Uretsky's (2008, 2016) research is focused on sexual risk, in particular how men's sexual 26 consumption facilitates HIV transmission, as well as how it is a product of state
27 regulation of business. Osburg (2013, 2016) is more interested in the lifestyles of the new 28 rich, the blurred boundaries between legality and illegality, and hence the circumstances
29 that give rise to corruption. Their research was conducted in different parts of China:
30
31 Dalian, a Northern port city and a Special Economic Zone (Zheng), the inland city of 32 Chengdu in Sichuan Province (Osburg) and in a frontier city, Ruili in Yunnan in the far
33 South West (Uretsky). In research in this field, the gender of researchers matters, as does 34 the way they position themselves in their fieldwork. As a male researcher, Osburg had 35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 easy access to the activities of a network of young entrepreneurs, but found it difficult to 4 gain much information from most of the women associated with them – in particular from 5 their wives, mistresses and female colleagues. As women, Zheng and Uretsky viewed the 6 sexual scene from perspectives that differed from Osburg's but also from each other's.
7
8 Uretsky was able to make contact with both entrepreneurs and local officials in Ruili and
9 be accepted into their social circles, including contact with their wives, but was excluded
10 from direct observation of sexualized entertainment, although men talked to her about 11 their sexual exploits. Zheng lived and worked alongside hostesses in karaoke bars and 12 was therefore privy to interaction between them and their clients.
13
14

15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25 What is clear from the differing perspectives offered by Zheng, Uretsky and Osburg is 26 that this sector of the sexual market most definitely has specifically “Chinese 27 characteristics” and is a product of “socialism with Chinese characteristics.” While 28 sharing some features of sexualized entertainment elsewhere in East Asia, the form it
29 takes in China has its own particularities due to its role in guanxi building and a politico-30 legal context which makes businessmen dependent on the goodwill of party officials in 31 their locality. All commentators agree that sexualized entertainment has become essential
32 to business success in China and that, therefore, the sexual economy is bound up with the 33 growth of the economy overall (Osburg, 2013, 2016; Uretsky, 2016; Zheng, 2012; 34 Zurndorfer, 2016). As Uretsky (2008) put it in her earlier work:
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47

48 ... the confluence of a market-oriented economy operating within a socialist-style 49 political system under the influence of traditional networking practices has 50 engendered a unique mode of patron-clientelism that brings them together over 51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 shared social rituals including feasting, drinking and female-centered
4
5 entertainment that is often coupled with sexual services. (p.801)
6
7

8 Uretsky (2016) argues that this is not an accidental result of pre-existing practices of 9 guanxi operating in an expanded market economy, but is a direct result of the Party's 10 efforts to "to maintain an ideological hold over flourishing entrepreneurialism" (p.51).
11 This contention casts doubt on Zheng's (2012) claim that sexualized consumption
12 represents a form of resistance to the state, suggesting that although such practices
13 conflict with "socialist morality," the state is implicated in sustaining them. Because the 14 local state apparatus controls access to key resources, such as land for building and the 15 various permits needed for entrepreneurial enterprises, and can smooth the way for 16 businessmen (or obstruct it) in a variety of ways, entertaining local officials and building
17 relationships of trust with them through yingchou becomes essential. For example, she 18 cites the case of a man who opened a karaoke bar. Building it, he said, was easy, taking 19 only a few months, but it had taken a few years to cultivate the necessary guanxi with 20 local officials to obtain permission to go ahead.
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38

39 It is not only relationships between businessmen and officials that are affected by the 40 practice of yingchou, but also relationships among officials. Within the local bureaucracy
41 sexualized entertainment is used to cement relationships between junior and more senior
42 officials. Engaging in such practices with a superior and facilitating his entertainment is a
43 way of proving loyalty to him and, paradoxically, to the Party – although it runs counter
44 to the official ideology and, indeed, the law. This is because the local bureaucracy is not 45 so much a meritocracy as what Uretsky calls a "virtuocracy" in which men rise up the 46 hierarchy as a result of being seen as "virtuous" by their leaders which, in turn, relies on 47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57

1
2
3 demonstrating loyalty. An official's advancement within this system is "based more on 4 the relationships he builds over food, drink and entertainment than on the technical skills
5 he can demonstrate in the office" (Uretsky, 2016, p.47).
6
7
8
9

10 Demonstrating loyalty to superiors can result in men spending five nights out of seven 11 entertaining until late at night. One man recounted how, when a senior official came to 12 town it would be essential to organize eating and drinking followed by the karaoke and 13 then, he said, "the soliciting of prostitutes [for the official] that comes along with it"
14 (Uretsky, 2006, p.49). Rather than simply being a by-product of China's shift to a market
15 economy, Uretsky suggests that the state's effort to exert control over business is 16 precisely what has led to these "new ways of demonstrating party loyalty," which have 17 "increased state control over individual, family and collective lives" (p.51), impacting not 18 only on the men involved but also on their wives and families, from whom they are kept 19 apart. Far from being a site of resistance to the Party-state, as in Zheng's (2012) account, 20 Uretsky's analysis makes it abundantly clear that this guanxi-building entertainment is 21 necessitated by the organizational structure of the Party bureaucracy and its oversight of 22 business.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40

41 Where Zheng, Uretsky and Osburg all agree is the importance of the trust built through 42 the homosocial bonds men create through business entertaining. While the relationship
43 between officials and entrepreneurs is a product of party organization (Uretsky, 2006), it
44 nonetheless operates at the margins of legality and leaves all concerned open to charges
45 of corruption and malpractice – even more so now with Xi Jinping's crackdown on 46 corrupt officials, when suicides among officials at risk are becoming common. While 47 writing before the current anti-corruption campaign took hold, Zheng suggests that sexual 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 consumption might be particularly important for building trust between entrepreneurs and 4 officials through “testing and bonding activities” (2012, p.659). She argues that through 5 appropriate sexual conduct, men demonstrate their competence and reliability. There are 6 right and wrong ways to consume, she says. In particular, a “man who is not able to 7 control his desire is seen as a danger to himself and the group” (Zheng, 2012, p.659). The 8 emphasis Zheng places on self-control in sexual consumption could be seen as an 9 interesting twist on the ideal Chinese sexual citizen as enterprising, responsible and self-
10 restraining (Wong, 2016).

11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22 The use of sexualized entertainment to build trust also requires trust because it could
23 potentially discredit those involved. Thus discretion is essential. Sexualized entertainment
24 only ever takes place among invited guests in private rooms of KTV establishments or 25 other venues, never in their public areas (Osburg, 2013; Zheng, 2012). One official told 26 Uretsky: “We can only hang out in these little rooms”, rather than the public areas,
27 “because our jobs can be threatened if people know we are here” (2016, p. 45). Ironically 28 it is the very illicit nature of these activities and the official disapproval of them that 29 reinforces their necessity – only through strong bonds of loyalty can men both court favor 30 in the exchanges between officials and entrepreneurs and simultaneously protect 31 themselves from accusations of corruption.

32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46 While this building of trust and cultivation of guanxi through yingchou is essential to 47 business success and official careers, it is not entirely a materialistic enterprise. Trust 48 implies an emotional element and guanxi in general is built on affective and not merely 49 instrumental relationships (Barbalet, 2017). Osburg’s (2013) analysis emphasizes the 50 importance of sentiment (ganqing) in the practice of yingchou. In order to develop guanxi

1
2
3 relationships it is not enough to simply entertain. Men strive to “transform relationships
4 of cold calculation into particularistic relationships embedded in moral economies of 5 sentiment” (p.43). A guest should leave at the end of the night not just feeling indebted,
6
7
8 “but with an embodied memory of shared pleasure and a latent sense of fondness, or 9
10
11 ganqing, for their host” (p.43). While seeking to “forge homosocial ties crucial to their 12
13
14 career success and financial futures” men also hope to transform these ties into kin-like 15
16
17 relationships “through shared experiences of intimacy, vulnerability and transgression”
18
19
20 (Osburg, 2016, p.163).
21

22 This sensibility is less prominent in Uretsky’s (2016) account. Possibly because of her
23
24 gender, men were more willing to discuss the down side of sexualized entertainment.
25
26 They complained about the obligations imposed by yingchou, how tiring it was and how 27
28 they viewed it as a grueling work obligation rather than pleasure. Men said they felt 29
30 compelled to engage in liaisons with sex workers even if they were reluctant to do so. To 31
32 refuse might result in reputational loss and loss of face (mianzi). Their social standing
33
34 depended on “successfully performing accepted social roles” (Uretsky, 2016, p.50). Here 35
36 there is potentially another instance of the “culture of conformity” (Huang & Pan, 2009),
37
38 the desire to fit in, to be “normal”.
39
40
41
42
43

44 While men’s negative attitudes to sexualized entertainment are not so evident in Osburg
45
46 or Zheng’s depictions of yingchou it is certainly clear that men experience a degree of 47
48 pressure to conform to what is expected of them and that trust and safety are dependent 49
50 on this conformity. All three researchers place an emphasis on the ways in which 51
52 participation in yingchou is essential to their gendered being; in Osburg’s words, to 53
54 “creating and enacting a particular version of masculinity that is associated with being a 55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 man of status and wealth in post-Mao China” (Osburg, 2016, p.163). Zheng similarly
4 discusses the way men used access to high end karaoke bars to signify wealth and status
5 and demonstrate entrepreneurial masculinity through their familiarity with such places
6 and their interactions with the hostesses. Here again, though, there were differences of 7 emphasis among the three researchers. Uretsky highlights a tension between elements of 8 masculinity: the need for business or career success and therefore successful performance
9 of yingchou on the one hand and the demands of being a good husband and father on the 10 other, both seen as equally important to being a good man, Zheng’s male informants, 11 however, do not appear to experience this tension. Rather most saw their obligations to 12 their wives as beginning and ending with supporting them economically. The Chengdu
13 businessmen depicted in Osburg’s (2013) study were only seen with their wives at 14 traditional Chinese celebrations. They kept their wives well away from the world of 15 business entertainment. Mistresses and girlfriends accompanied them to banquets and 16 KTV, not wives.

17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36 Zheng’s (2012) study stands out from the other two in her depiction of a form of 37 masculinity that explicitly establishes itself through dominance over women. She 38 describes how men display their power over women in selecting hostesses from a line up
39 and ordering them around. According to one of these men: “Hostesses are like toys, 40 something to serve men and help them relax” (Zheng, 2012, p.661). Interactions with the 41 hostesses “provided a testing ground... for alliances between entrepreneurs and officials”
42 through which they proved themselves to each other (p. 653):

43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53 Men would share companionship and pleasure but would also attempt to 54 demonstrate their self-control through their emotional detachment from, and 55

1
2
3 control of, the hostesses...One aspect of the karaoke bar is men's triumph over
4 women. Triumph in the bar prepares men for triumph in the market world. (p.
5
6
7 653)
8
9

10 Men also demonstrated masculinity through sexual prowess: "sexual potency was an 11 index of a man's business competence" (Zheng, 2012, p.661). Zheng tells of one man
12 who avoided sexual contact with hostesses because he was afraid of contracting a 13 sexually transmitted disease. He was, as a result, subjected to a campaign of ridicule and 14 accused of being impotent. In the end he responded to this pressure. In front of his friends 15 he "aggressively pinched hostesses' breasts," insulted them, had sex with them and 16 bragged about his sexual encounters (Zheng, 2012, p.661).
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26

27 We have discussed Zheng's account of men's sexual conduct in the bars at length 28 because she is alone among the three researchers in depicting such a domineering form of 29 masculine sexuality. While her account chimes with those of Osburg and Uretsky in 30 identifying the role that collective sexual consumption plays in promoting business-
31 oriented homosocial bonding, she places far more emphasis on male power over women
32 and the importance of sexual activity itself in establishing men's masculine and business
33 credentials. Uretsky, of course, was not in a position to observe men's sexual interaction 34 with hostesses since she was excluded from this element of men's entertainment, whereas 35 Zheng, in positioning herself among the hostesses, saw it at close quarters. Osburg was 36 integrated into the social circles of his male informants but either did not see, or failed to 37 note, men exerting their power so directly over hostesses. It seems unlikely, however,
38 that Zheng's observations are an isolated case and more probable that similar scenes are 39 occurring in other KTV venues in other parts of China but have simply not been recorded 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 The practices of yingchou of which sexual consumption is a part have evolved over time
4 alongside China's economic development and as a result of the relationship between the 5 state and the market. Where banqueting was the main activity through which business
6 relationships were conducted up to the 1990s, the sexualized environment of KTV has 7 now become more central. Zheng (2012) sees KTV as supplanting banqueting as the 8 main venue for male bonding and as part of men's rebellion against the state given that 9 state banquets in the past were symbols of state power. Osburg (2013), however, regards
10 this shift as part of ongoing inflation in the expectations attached to yingchou. In his 11 account, as in Uretsky's (2016), banqueting precedes the move to the karaoke club in a 12 typical evening's entertainment rather than being replaced by KTV. Rising expectations,
13 however, have not stopped there. Whereas once the favor of a business contact or official
14 could be courted by supplying him with a sex-worker for the night, this is now not always 15 enough. What is more effective is finding a man a mistress or girlfriend, preferably a 16 young, attractive, educated and accomplished white-collar worker, a woman of quality
17 (suzhi). Hostesses and sex-workers are, from elite men's point of view, cheap and 18 disposable; girlfriends and mistresses are more of a status symbol. Many of the men
19 featured in Uretsky's and Zheng's studies kept mistresses or ernai, as did Osburg's
20 Chengdu businessmen – though they distanced their practices from bao erani (keeping a 21 second wife) which they saw as lower class. Wealthy men, then, are able to trade their 22 assets for women's youth and beauty. As Osburg (2013) remarks, in the business world 23 where women's greatest asset is their sexual attractiveness, men only need money "and 24 even the oldest, ugliest most uncouth country bumpkin will be transformed by wealth into 25 an object of desire" (p.182).

1
2
3 Mistresses - ernai or xiaosan – are sometimes seen as unproductive “grey” women, living
4 off the work of others, as they are by the feminist economist He Qinglian (as cited in 5 Osburg, 2013). This is clearly not an accurate view of their place in China where the 6 sexual market is so central to the economy. Aside from the profits generated by the sex-
7 industry itself, it is clear that the women who service elite men as hostesses, escorts and 8 mistresses play a central role in the business practices associated with China’s economic 9 growth and are therefore far from marginal.

10
11
12 The contradictions inherent in these practices, particularly between the official party 13 ideology and “socialist morality” on the one hand and the use of sexual consumption to 14 facilitate business connections on the other, raises questions in the light of Xi Jinping’s
15 austerity campaign and crackdown on corruption. As extravagant banqueting becomes 16 less socially acceptable, the adverse effect on the restaurant trade and sales of expensive
17 liquor is already evident. The consequences for sexualized entertainment are less clear.

18
19
20 As Ko & Weng (2012) note, corruption evolves and changes its form each time
21 regulations change or new campaigns against it are mounted – and that which takes place
22 privately has replaced more overt forms such as misappropriation of public funds. Since 23 sexualized entertainment is less visible than lavish banqueting, taking place in private 24 rooms, it might actually become a relatively more important element of yingchou.

25
26
27 At the same time China’s increasing economic influence globally, including business
28 investments overseas, creates the potential for the export of its sexualized business
29 practices. This seems to be the case in Vietnam which, like China, has a post-socialist
30 marketizing economy in a communist party-state. Here local Vietnamese elites cultivate 31 links with Chinese businessmen. In Kimberly Kay Hoang’s ethnography of the stratified 32

1
2
3 sex industry in Vietnam, the highest tier establishments cater for local elites –
4 entrepreneurs and party officials – entertaining Asian, mostly Chinese, business contacts
5 in order to solicit foreign direct investment. The private hostess clubs where this takes 6 place are very exclusive – it is only Asian businessmen who are seen as worth courting in 7 these venues. European businessmen and even overseas Vietnamese operate on lower
8 rungs on the commercial sex and business hierarchies. The Vietnamese and their Chinese 9 contacts thus capitalize on and celebrate Asian economic ascendancy and western 10 decline. The sense of superiority thereby engendered further enhances their sense of 11 powerful masculinity (Hoang, 2015). They are no longer the effeminate oriental “other”
12 of the western colonial imagination, but can afford to ignore the west and do business
13 with those with whom they share a cultural affinity and associated embodied practices.
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28

29 While we have emphasized the importance of women’s sexualized labor for the Chinese 30 economy, there are other women on whom these practices impact that we have yet to 31 mention: women involved in the business world and the wives of elite men – the women
32 abandoned for nights on end while their husbands entertain other men and are entertained
33 by hostesses, sex-workers and their mistresses. Moreover, the corporate practices we 34 have described represent only one facet of China’s highly gendered and heteronormative 35 sexual culture and its assumptions about male sexual “needs” and women’s role in 36 satisfying them. This essentialist understanding of gender differences and sexuality, 37 bolstered by Party-state ideology, goes largely unquestioned within a society that 38 privileges conformity so that male dominance is taken to be the natural order of things.
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 conform (sexually and/or politically) but also arise in everyday interactions at work, at
4 home and in public spaces, where they are so routine that they are seen as unremarkable.
5
6 These intimate injustices, whether hidden in the domestic sphere or hidden in plain sight
7
8 in the workplace are most evident and prevalent in the inequalities and problems that 9
10 women face daily in a society that is increasingly sexualized and where gender divisions
11
12 are deeply entrenched. While they are often not seen as injustices by Chinese people, but 13
14 “just the way things are,” this does not mean that women are entirely passive or without 15
16 agency in negotiating their way through China’s sexual landscape. Recent research not 17
18 only brings to light the daily injustices women experience, but also reveals the strategies
19
20 they use to deal with them. In discussing these issues, we first consider research on 21
22 women in the workplace before moving on to more private injustices.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 Everyday injustices at work: China’s sexualized occupational culture

34
35 Sexualized labor in both Chinese and western contexts is most often associated with the 36
37 service sector, where young women are employed for their looks and charm and are often 38
39 expected to engage in sexual display through their dress and demeanor (e.g. Adkins, 40
41 1995; Otis, 2012; Xu & Feiner, 2007; Yang, 2011). The sexualized business practices
42
43 prevalent in China, however, impact directly on the lives of female entrepreneurs and 44
45 white-collar workers as well as those in the service sector, albeit in different ways (Liu,
46
47 2016; Zurdorfer, 2016). It can result in women’s exclusion from male-dominated arenas
48
49 as well as inclusion into sexualized business practices. There are also numerous other
50
51 ways in which women are sexualized within everyday workplace interactions.
52
53
54
55
56
57

1
2
3 The sexualized networking of businessmen and officials obviously puts their female
4 counterparts at a disadvantage, since they are excluded from much of the activity through 5 which alliances are established and deals are made and thus have to establish guanxi in 6 the interstices of male business; they are also regarded as morally suspect (Osburg, 2013;
7 Zurndorfer, 2016). Female entrepreneurs do exist and some are very successful, but they 8 are fewer in number than men and have to be careful in the way they negotiate business.
9 Uretsky (2016) and Osburg (2013) each provide an example of a businesswoman
10 engaging in yingchou. These women provided lavish banquets for their quests but 11 absented themselves from the more sexualized environment of KTV. The woman mining 12 entrepreneur interviewed by Osburg (2013) left the sexualized aspects of entertainment to 13 her male employees, because, she said, “it was easier for men to build relationships”
14 when she was not there (p.151). In so saying she appears to echo the views of the men,
15 who found the presence of women business associates in sexualized spaces inhibiting.
16 Businesswomen were seen as nüqiangren (strong women), undesirable as sexual partners
17 and unwelcome when men were entertaining. Yet they were also suspected of having 18 used their sexuality to get ahead. So they were damned both ways, regarded either as 19 having used their sexuality to advance themselves or as too unattractive to have done so.
20
21 There are some women, aside from hostesses, who are welcome in the environment of 22 KTV: young and attractive white collar workers (Liu, 2016; Osburg, 2013). White collar 23 women are viewed positively, as embodying suzhi (quality) through their education and 24 middle-class occupation, as well as youthful attractiveness. These were seen as ideal
25 women to take as lovers or mistresses by Chengdu businessmen – or to introduce to 26 influential business contacts or officials (Osburg, 2013). Female entrepreneurs, on the 27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 other hand, had very negative views of young women who used their sexuality for 4 advancement – but from Osburg’s account it seems that some of them were quite happy
5 to use their female white collar employees to entertain business clients.
6
7
8
9

10
11 In China young women graduates employed in the business sector are known as “white-12 collar beauties,” itself a term that implies sexualization. While these women make an 13 appearance in the literature on business culture, and are much discussed in popular media
14 in China, their working lives have received little attention from researchers, perhaps 15 because they are seen as relatively privileged and thus not deserving of critical attention.
16 One scholar, however, has conducted intensive and revealing research on the sexualized
17 labor and gender discrimination characteristic of white collar work in China, Jieyu Liu
18 (2008, 2016). Liu undertook ethnographic work in an export-orientated, state-owned 19 enterprise in Jiangsu Province, referred to as “The Organization”, where she joined the 20 white-collar workforce and also conducted interviews with managers and workers. In 21 addition, she conducted in-depth and repeated interviews with 20 women and 10 men, all 22 graduates, who were employed in the sales departments of a range of state-owned and 23 privately owned domestically-oriented companies. She was therefore able to identify 24 differences in working practices leading to differing forms of sexualization.
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43

44 Liu’s analysis amply demonstrates the ways in which the intersection between gender and 45 sexuality in the workplace serves to reinforce its male dominated hierarchy. She draws
46 our attention to the “moralization” of women’s sexual conduct in China, creating a sharp
47 distinction between reputable and disreputable women. As a result, while white collar 48 workers are routinely sexualized, they cannot use their sexuality as a means of 49 empowering themselves in the workplace; they cannot appear to be actively sexual (Liu, 50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 2016). The sexualization of white collar women takes varied forms in differing work
4 contexts, which Liu (2016) discusses through distinguishing between sex in work and sex
5 as work. Sex in work is discussed in relation to the sexual objectification of women in 6 workplace interaction and work-related activities; sex as work encompasses the ways in 7 which employers use women's sexual appeal to generate business.
8
9

10
11
12 In The Organization there was a tension between the de-sexualization and sexualization
13 of women. The Organization's rules, which Liu was handed when she arrived, stipulated
14 a strict dress code for women: no sleeveless or low-cut clothing, no bare midriffs and no
15 skirts shorter than knee length. White-collar women were expected to appear respectable
16 and professional. At the same time they were routinely made the objects of sexual banter,
17 particularly from senior men, which was seen by the men as making for a "pleasant"
18 working atmosphere. A section manager in said of this practice:
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30

31
32 It can stimulate productivity. Life won't be boring. If I flirt with women
33 colleagues the atmosphere will be lifted up. I hope that in my section there are 34 considerable levels of office banter as I find it can be inspiring (Liu, 2016, p.76)
35
36
37
38
39

40 One senior woman, who often found herself the only woman among male colleagues, was 41 constantly the butt of sexual jokes. She reported that when she began work in The 42 Organization this had made her very uncomfortable, but she had since become used to it
43 and simply did not react (Liu, 2016, p. 77). Whereas women in western contexts might 44 flirt back or answer back to men who behave in this way, this was not a strategy open to 45 women in The Organization; actively flirting would damage their reputations and it
46 would be difficult to challenge a man who was senior to them. There is also no
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 recognition of and no institutional remedies for sexual harassment in Chinese workplaces
4
5 even were men's conduct to be recognized as such. Women do, however, have spaces
6
7 where they can joke among themselves and in a female dominated environment may even 8
9 use similar jokes against a man, but could not do so in the public space of the office.
10
11 They could, and did, also warn each other about persistent harassers. The most common 12
13 and effective form of resistance against workplace injustices that Liu discusses – though 14
15 not directly in relation to sexual issues – is emotional display. Because women are seen
16
17 as “naturally” more fragile than men and because managers are concerned to maintain a 18
19 “harmonious atmosphere”, men fear upsetting women; moreover, a woman's display of 20
21 emotion can shame a wrongdoer. While this may appear to be a weapon of the weak, as 22
23 Liu (2016) says, “in a relational society like China it has the potential to retrieve justice
24
25 by throwing into question the actions of the wrongdoers” (p. 115).
26
27
28
29
30

31 One event during Liu's time with The Organization provides a particularly graphic 32
33 example of sexualization in the working environment and also brings out the issue of 34
35 political control. State run companies typically organize leisure activities for their 36
37 employees, in this case a basketball tournament involving other state-owned enterprises
38
39 in the area. Only men were involved in the teams. In order to include women, the 40
41 managers of the companies decided that they should act as cheer-leaders for their 42
43 respective teams – and they called these the “basketball babes”! Joining the cheer-leading 44
45 team was defined as a “political” task and therefore mandatory. In a state-owned 46
47 company there is always a Communist Party presence and in The Organization the 48
49 manager was also the party secretary – so a refusal to participate would be deemed 50
51 disloyal to the company and the Party. One woman did refuse and Liu subsequently 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 discovered that she was likely to be excluded from other activities, including work-
4 related opportunities. Thus the Party is implicated in promoting a sexualized work
5 culture.
6
7
8
9

10 There was, however, some collective resistance from the cheer-leading team. Some of the 11 senior men tried to influence the women's costume, saying it should "excite one's 12 eyeballs." The women cited the company dress code in order to avoid wearing too
13 revealing an outfit – and were criticized for being too traditional and conservative. They 14 compromised by wearing cropped short-sleeved T-shirts and mini-skirts with shorts
15 underneath. During the matches the cheer-leaders rather than the players were the main 16 draw and numerous ribald comments were heard from the audience, commenting on 17 women's bodies or complaining that they weren't "sexy" enough. Afterwards the 18 women's performance became the subject of another round of sexual and sexist jokes.
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30

31 While this "eroticized workplace culture" reinforced "male dominance and hetero-
32 normative control" (Liu, 2016, p. 86), women sales staff within The Organization were 33 not expected to use their sexuality to woo clients. Because their clients were foreigners,
34 The Organization "protected" their female employees from too much contact with them
35 by relegating them to support roles (and lower pay) in sales teams. The situation was 36 different for the sales employees of companies oriented to the domestic market. These 37 companies "actively and deliberately institutionalized and deployed the selling of 38 women's sexuality in their non-sexual economic operations" (Liu, 2016, p. 89). Women 39 sales representatives were selected for their beauty and expected to take good care of 40 their appearance, whereas the men only had to be clean and smart. Using their physical 41 attractiveness to lure clients was seen as essential to the women's work and, in a 42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 competitive working environment, where sales performance was often ranked and linked
4 to pay, they were under considerable pressure to do so. On the other hand they were 5
6 conscious of the need to protect their reputations as professional women so they strove to 7
8 appear “pretty but not sexy” (Liu, 2016, p. 91). In their dress, demeanor and behavior
9
10 they walked a perilous tightrope between respectability and disreputability. They were 11
12 aware that they could use techniques associated with femininity to lure clients that men
13
14 could not. As one said: “women have the advantage, during the negotiation, women could 15
16 sajiao” whereas if a man did this, or a woman did it with another woman it would be 17
18 “disgusting” (Liu, 2016, p. 92). The term sajiao has no easy English translation, though
19
20 the behavior it describes is not unknown in the Anglophone world. Liu glosses it as 21
22 acting “like a spoiled and naughty child,” but this does not quite capture it. It is certainly 23
24 child-like; it conveys a sense of dependency on the other in order to make demands on 25
26 them; it involves “playing cute”, pestering and wheedling and often the use of a high 27
28 pitched, pleading tone of voice. It is a widely seen as a means by which young, feminine
29
30 Chinese women try to get their own way, especially in intimate relationships. Its use in 31
32 the context of a sales negotiation therefore implies an intimacy with the other that borders
33
34 on the sexual and demonstrates a willingness to use femininity to manipulate a man. The 35
36 women sales representatives in general “recognized the value to them of being able to 37
38 play on men’s sexual susceptibility” (Liu, 2016, p. 92). When asked about the 39
40 contradictions between such behavior and their attempts to present themselves as 41
42 desexualized and professional, these women stressed the importance of subtlety in using 43
44 their femininity. Their male colleagues recognized the advantages this gave women, but 45
46 despised them for it.
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 These sales representatives were expected to take part in the evenings of entertainment
4 typical of male business culture (Liu, 2008, 2016). As Liu describes this activity, as 5
6 ‘three step socializing’, it differs a little from that we have discussed above. While it
7
8 begins with banqueting and moves on to karaoke, it ends at a sauna, which is where 9
10 encounters with sex-workers occurred. Most of the women she interviewed accompanied 11
12 the men in banqueting and karaoke, but left before the sauna. This discretion did not 13
14 shield them from sexualized interaction. In banqueting they were encouraged to play an 15
16 active part in toasting and drinking (see also Mason, 2013), which was seen as attracting 17
18 masculine attention, and to tolerate much sexual joking at their expense. When they 19
20 moved on to karaoke they entered a much more sexualized environment and were 21
22 expected to sing duets with men, dance with them and submit to unwanted physical 23
24 contact and sexual advances. While some women expressed a strong dislike of such male
25
26 behavior, others simply accepted it but played down its sexual import so as not to align 27
28 themselves with disreputable women. They were expected to be self-reliant and to cope
29
30 with these situations. A woman manager said “if a woman couldn’t take this light-
31
32 heartedly, I’d advise her not to stay in this occupation” (Liu, 2016, p. 97). Unlike the 33
34 women in The Organization who had a degree of solidarity and warned each other against 35
36 known harassers, who were colleagues rather than clients, these women were in 37
38 competition with each other and their male counterparts for clients and sales; to “one 39
40 woman a client might be a harasser, to another he might be an economic opportunity”
41
42 (Liu, 2016, p. 98).

43
44
45 There were limits, however, to what was expected of women; it was accepted that they 46
47 would not attend venues where commercial sex took place. Women could use their 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 femininity to make sales but, like women entrepreneurs, they were excluded from places
4 where their male colleagues could clinch deals. Moreover, if a man closed a good deal it
5 was put down to his ability; in a woman it was attributed to her physical attractiveness.
6
7
8 Finally, the use of sexualized feminine charm served to naturalize gender differences and,
9
10 at the same time, put women at risk of reputational damage, something men did not have 11
12 to worry about. In both types of company Liu discusses, the heterosexualized, male-13
14 dominated environment in which women worked was riddled with injustices and 15
16 inequities. While Liu is at pains to present women as having agency, which indeed they 17
18 did have, this more often involved accommodating to the system than resisting or 19
20 subverting it.
21
22
23
24
25

26
27 Similar patterns emerge in other occupations where young women are engaged in selling
28
29 or promoting a variety of commodities and services (Zurndorfer, 2016). At a lower level 30
31 than the “white-collar beauties” are the service workers, primarily from more working 32
33 class backgrounds and with lower than undergraduate qualifications. Eileen Otis (2008, 34
35 2012, 2016a) provides illuminating insights into women’s working conditions in her 36
37 ethnographic study of two luxury hotels, one in Beijing catering to foreign businessmen, 38
39 the other in Kunming, which attracted Chinese tourists. The differences between the two 40
41 hotels parallel those found by Liu (2016) between workers in firms selling into foreign 42
43 and domestic markets. Both hotels deliberately recruited attractive young women, under 44
45 the age of 27, and trained them to enact particular forms of heterosexual femininity, but 46
47 in different ways. Their contrasting labor regimes led to women cultivating “virtual 48
49 professionalism” in the Beijing hotel and “virtuous professionalism” in the Kunming 50
51
52
53
54
55 hotel.
56
57

1
2
3 In the Beijing hotel young women were trained into an American style of 4
5 heterosexualized femininity designed to appeal to cosmopolitan elite men – to style their 6
7 hair and make-up subtly and elegantly, to be friendly, smile and make eye contact and to 8
9 learn about and cater to their clients' individual needs. While male hotel employees were 10
11 expected simply to look smart, the rules on women employees' clothing, make-up and 12
13 demeanor were detailed, precise and comprehensive. Although the women were recruited 14
15 on the basis of their appearance and expected to be pleasing to male eyes, the 16
17 (hetero)sexualized element of femininity was not overt and clients did not, in turn,
18
19 sexualize the workers, enabling them to maintain their professional façade. It should be 20
21 remembered in this context, however, that heterosexuality involves more than its 22
23 explicitly sexual elements (Jackson, 2006; Jackson & Scott, 2010). Although Otis does 24
25 not comment on this, the ways in which these women workers were expected to make 26
27 male guests feel at home in a foreign hotel – knowing everything from their tastes in food
28
29 and drink to where they liked to keep their toothbrush and anticipating their every need – 30
31 is similar to that expected of attentive wives in traditional marriages. They could be seen,
32
33 therefore, as an army of surrogate wives.
34
35
36
37
38
39

40
41 The working environment in the Kunming hotel was much more sexualized, largely 42
43 because the clientele largely comprised male tourists attracted by the city's sex industry
44
45 (Otis, 2008, 2012). Kunming is the capital of Yunnan province in the far South West of 46
47 China, an area that is home to a number of ethnic minorities who are seen as having more
48
49 liberal sexual mores than the Han Chinese majority. Han men view women from these 50
51 ethnic minorities as exotic and exciting (Uretsky, 2016), hence the attraction of Kunming
52
53 to sex tourists. The women working in this hotel were not expected to anticipate their 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 clients' needs as in Beijing, but to prioritize selling the hotel's products and services to 4
5 clients – and these included escort services provided through the hotel, although the 6
7 women who accompanied men to KTV and saunas were not employees. The women
8
9 employed directly by the hotel wore uniforms, but these often served to sexualize them;
10
11 for example waitresses in the restaurant wore a close-fitting version of the traditional 12
13 qipao slit to the top of the thigh. The “virtuous professionalism” displayed by the workers
14
15 in this hotel was adopted in their attempts to avoid sexual advances from the guests. They 16
17 were constantly subjected to sexual harassment and therefore had to make considerable 18
19 efforts to distinguish themselves from the sex-workers who frequented the hotel and to 20
21 fend off men who assumed that Kunming women were there to service their sexual 22
23 desires. The differences between the two hotels, then, tell us not just about their labor
24
25 regimes but the different expectations of affluent Chinese and Western men.
26
27
28
29

30
31 Sexualized labor in its varied forms also involves aesthetic labor, the work women do on 32
33 their own bodies to present an appropriately attractive and/or professional image.
34
35

36 Underpinning this is China's beauty business staffed by an army of low paid workers,
37
38 mostly women, working in beauty salons, at cosmetic counters in department stores and 39
40 in cosmetics factories, all contributing to a market second only to that in the USA in 41
42 volume (Otis, 2016b; Yang, 2011). The state has played a part in this, in encouraging its 43
44 growth as part of a building an internal consumer culture essential to expanding the 45
46 economy beyond the older production centered, export-oriented stage of development and 47
48 helping to construct consuming citizen-subjects who buy into the Party-state's project
49
50 (Yang, 2011). It has done so through a variety of means from promoting beauty contests
51
52 in the early 2000s to encouraging laid-off women factory workers to open beauty salons.
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 In so doing it has contributed directly and indirectly to feminizing and sexualizing its 4 female population. Jie Yang (2011) argues that the beauty economy “capitalizes on the 5 erotic-aesthetic functions of the female body and also relies on...the use value of their 6 bodies” (p.346). Given the multiple ways that sexualized femininity contributes to the 7 Chinese economy, from facilitating men’s business transactions to promoting sales and 8 being integral to service provision, it could also be said that these bodies have exchange
9 value – and not just when they are traded explicitly for a cash return. This is made
10 explicit by a Beijing hotel manager who said to his female trainees, “our profit comes 11 from your smiles” (Otis, 2016a, p.927).
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23

24 China’s beauty industry, and the wider promotion of sexualized femininity, has an impact
25 on women not only as workers, but also as girlfriends and wives who are under 26 increasing pressure to look good, especially older women with affluent husbands who are 27 mindful of the risks of losing them to young “grey” women seeking rich patrons (Ying, 28 2011; Zurndorfer, 2016).
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36

37 Inequality and intimate injustices in heterosexual relationships

38
39

40 The highly gendered and sexualized working culture and the existence of the seven-tiered
41 hierarchy of sex workers (Jeffreys, 2004, 2010b; Pan, 1999) make life difficult for many 42 wives who cannot help but worry about their husbands’ loyalty and the stability of their 43 marriages. Chinese wives have to face a number of threats, not just from the Other
44 Woman (xiaosan, little three), but the many women who are ready to provide emotional 45 and sexual services to their husbands. These potential competitors are mostly young and 46 beautiful. Some are educated and can engage in interesting and intelligent conversations
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 with their husbands. It is not only rich men's wives who have reason to worry since the
4 sex industry provides services for men at every point in the social hierarchy. The complex
5 division of labor in the sex industry, including both "black" and "grey" women, also 6 makes it harder for women to judge whether their husbands have visited prostitutes or are 7 having extra-marital relationships. Even if their husbands are caught or admit their 8 extramarital liaisons, there is very little wives can do. So there is considerable pressure on 9 wives to compete with these women for their husbands' attention. They have to be the 10 good wives that their husbands expect them to be if they are to maintain their marriages
11 and social status as the only wife, or at least the main wife. While their men are out 12 carousing with work colleagues and bar girls or visiting sex-workers, these women are 13 keeping the household running, doing childcare and also doing the relational work
14 involved with fulfilling filial obligations to both their own parents and their in-laws.
15 There is little work exploring these "first wives" in mainland China, aside from the 16 business that sexual infidelity has generated for (technically illegal) private investigators
17 (Jeffreys, 2010a). Research by Shen Hsiu Hua (2008, 2014) on the wives of Taiwanese 18 businessmen who work and maintain relationships in China suggests that these "first 19 wives" make the best of it. A wife puts up with her husband's infidelities as long as he 20 continues to support her and finds ways to keep the marriage intact while enjoying the 21 additional freedom his frequent absences affords her. In living out this scenario, both 22 husbands and wives become "situational singles" taking a "gendered break" from 23 marriage (Shen, 2014, p.264), husbands by being freed from sexual and emotional 24 monogamy and wives by being liberated from daily care for their husbands. Similarly,
25 Hong Kong women whose husbands have intra-national cross border romances (Ho, 26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 2012), often have to find ways to cope or just suffer in silence and wait for their husbands
4
5 to come home after these romances have failed.
6
7

8
9 The threat to women's marriages comes, in the main, from their husbands' dalliances 10
11 with much younger women. With the development of consumerism, the post-Mao gender 12
13 ideology celebrates a sexualized femininity associated with beauty and youth, subjecting 14
15 women to the male gaze and making them conscious of evaluation. As Jie Yang (2011)
16
17 argues, the gendered representations of nennü (tender women) and shunü (ripe women)
18
19 reassert the cultural dominance of a masculine gaze and a male body politic. Yang
20
21 interviewed beauty care workers, beauty salon clients and managers in Changping
22
23 (Beijing) and Jinan between 2003 and 2008. Among them was a woman in her mid-
24
25 fifties, who was a former party secretary of a factory in Beijing. She told Yang that when 26
27 she was young, she was called upon to focus only on work and socialist construction
28
29 (shehui zhuyi jianshe) without paying much attention to her appearance, but now she 30
31 wanted to make up for her lost youth by taking advantage of new cosmetics and 32
33 technologies as a form of revenge against her husband who had had a series of affairs
34
35 with younger women. Her husband did not appreciate her efforts and ridiculed her as an 36
37 "old, yellow cucumber wearing green paints, pretending to be young" (lao huanggua
38
39 shua luqi, zhuang nen) (Yang, 2011, p. 334). While expressing frustration about the value 40
41 placed on appearance, she said she would persist in trying to save her marriage. As Yang
42
43 comments, this story sheds light on the problems faced by many Chinese wives trying to 44
45 compete with younger rivals in a culture that increasingly values women primarily in 46
47 terms of youth and beauty.
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 A further problem that men's extra-marital sexual activity poses for wives is the risk of 4 sexual infection. The UN reports that 46.5% of sexual transmission of HIV in China
5 occurs through heterosexual contact, with a quarter of these transmissions estimated to be 6 between spouses and infection among women dramatically increasing. Women accounted 7 for 15.3% of those infected in 1998 and 30.5% in 2009. This is an issue central to 8 Uretsky's (2016) study of the consequences of yingchou practices in Ruili, a city with a
9 high prevalence of HIV infection and AIDS. She cites the case one wife of a local official 10 who had been infected through her husband's consumption of sexual services in the 11 course of business entertaining. While clearly not happy with the situation, she excused 12 her husband and blamed the system, which pressures men into practices that they cannot 13 avoid if they wish their careers to prosper (Uretsky, 2016). This justification is a credible 14 one; such situations cannot be explained simply by reference to individual men's 15 behavior, but are produced by the socio-political system.
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 In the face of all the threats and uncertainties facing their marriages, Chinese women
35 have to find ways to protect their own financial well-being and their children's interests.
36 One option open to wives who are aggrieved by their husbands' extra-marital activities is 37 to divorce. China's marriage laws have, until recently, benefitted women (see Davis, 38 2014). In 1950, as part of the Maoist project of promoting gender equality, child 39 marriage, arranged marriage and polygamy were outlawed and subsequent changes to the 40 1950 law have, among other things made divorce easier. Divorce, however, can create 41 new problems. In particular, recent changes in the marriage law have undermined 42 women's previously established rights to conjugal property, thus adversely affecting 43 wives' security (Davis, 2014).
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 As Davis (2014) makes clear, the change in the law has to be understood in the context of 4
5 China's economic reforms and the consequent privatization of urban housing stock, as 6
7 well as the practices of Chinese families. Rapidly rising property prices since 8
9 privatization, especially in major cities, have put a home beyond the means of most 10
11 newly married couples, requiring multigenerational investment from their families 12
13 (Zhong & Ho, 2014). Because those who had a financial stake in the conjugal home went 14
15 beyond the couple, there was a potential for disputes over divorce and inheritance, 16
17 creating a need for greater clarity in the law governing private property. In its 18
19 interpretation of the marriage law of December 2003, the Supreme People's Court (SPC)
20
21 confirmed the property rights of anyone who had invested in a marital home. Since it is 22
23 traditional, and still usual, for the man's family to provide housing for newlyweds, a 24
25 woman's in-laws might now have a claim on her home equal to or greater than her own
26
27 as a wife. This ruling clearly disadvantaged women, but it also left conjugal claims to the 28
29 marital home vague, leading to an increase in family property disputes. In August 2011
30
31 the SPC issued a further interpretation, which clarified the situation by strengthening 32
33 individual property rights, further weakening conjugal claims on the marital home and 34
35 thereby a wife's rights to the property. This interpretation "privileged the ownership 36
37 claims of the spouse who made the down payment even if, after the marriage, both parties
38
39 paid the mortgage" (Davis, 2014, p.50). A divorcing wife might thus find she had no 40
41 rights in the marital home. If she continued to live there she might find it sold over her
42
43 head, since the 2011 ruling also allowed individuals to sell the marital home without 44
45 consulting their spouse and protected the rights of the third party to which it had been 46
47 sold.
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 In this situation we might wonder why women do not challenge current practices and 4
5 insist on having their names on the deeds to the home at the outset, giving them clear
6
7 legal co-ownership. It has been suggested that women fail to do so because of the 8
9 pressure on them to marry and their unwillingness to enter into a dispute with their future
10
11 spouses and in-laws prior to the wedding (Hong-Fincher, 2014; Zurndorfer, 2016). Once 12
13 married, wives are not in a good position to bargain and so they may have to accept the 14
15 co-existence of ernai or xiaosan (little three) and new relationship scripts that they find 16
17 unfair. The alternative is the risk of losing their home and all they have invested in it, not 18
19 only in terms of their contribution to the mortgage, but also all the domestic labor they 20
21 have put into its upkeep.
22
23
24
25

26
27 It is still the case in China that women undertake the bulk of domestic work and 28
29 childrearing (Cao, 2017; Du et al., 2015; Shu et al., 2012). Although most married 30
31 Chinese women are employed full-time, men remain, symbolically if not actually, the 32
33 family breadwinners. This ideology, underpinned by naturalistic understandings of 34
35 femininity and masculinity, justifies the unequal marital division of labor. Women are 36
37 seen as primarily family centered and are expected to facilitate their husbands'
38
39 breadwinning role and maintain family harmony. As recent research suggests, men 40
41 appreciate it if women live up to these ideals and complain if they do not – whether by 42
43 being inadequate at housework or failing to raise a child by appropriate “scientific”
44
45 standards (Cao, 2017). It is not only domestic chores that constitute a wife’s lot but also 46
47 the task of maintaining harmony with parents, in-laws and wider kin. While geographical 48
49 mobility, the decline of three-generation households and renegotiated intergenerational
50
51 contracts have reduced the filial obligations of younger generations towards their elders, 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 they have not eradicated them (Liu, 2016; Qi, 2015; Zhang, 2016). Women are still 4 expected to undertake much of the work involved in acts of filial piety (xiao) and must
5 not only perform xiao appropriately, but be seen to be doing so (Zhang, 2016).
6
7

8
9
10 While women may have more autonomy prior to marriage, even so they experience
11 gendered inequalities and injustices in their dating relationships. Wang Xiyi (2017)
12 reports a high level of sexual coercion in dating in Beijing, where many women's loss of 13 virginity was accomplished by force. Moreover, the idea of men's "natural" sexual 14 "needs" is still prevalent and it is women's responsibility to manage these "needs" and 15 deal with the consequences if pregnancy results from fulfilling them (Xie, in press). As 16 pre-marital sex has become more common, so has pre-marital pregnancy. Unmarried
17 motherhood is not much of an option in China: it is not only highly stigmatized but also 18 extra-legal: a premarital birth is an unauthorized birth. The remaining choices are to 19 marry or terminate the pregnancy. Abortion is now widely available as a result of the one
20 child policy. It is difficult to ascertain how many of China's over 9 million abortions
21 annually are to unmarried women, since they are not recorded as such, but Xie (in press)
22 cites official statistics indicating that 50% are to women below the age of 25 without a
23 pregnancy history, who are likely to be single. Xie argues that women's pregnancy is 24 moralized and responsabilized, as revealed by the way women she interviewed talked
25 about it. Women are blamed for becoming pregnant, for not protecting themselves, either 26 by resisting male sexual demands or not using contraception (despite the fact that the 27 most commonly used contraception method among the unmarried is the condom). If they 28 could not marry for any reason, then abortion was regarded as the only responsible 29 choice. A responsible woman should not consider having a child outside marriage – this 30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 would make her a bad mother. Abortion, however, was seen as potentially damaging a
4 women's body and therefore her future reproductive capacity, also damaging her status as 5 a good woman, and was therefore stigmatized. The morality here was not, as in western 6 societies, structured around the "right to life" of the fetus versus a "woman's right to 7 choose," but in terms of the responsible choice a woman as a potential mother should
8 make (Xie, in press).
9

10
11
12 A moral, responsible Chinese woman produces a "quality" child at the right time, soon
13 after marriage (McMillan, 2006). In keeping with the Party-state's population agenda, 14 pregnancy has been increasingly medicalized and women are encouraged to monitor their 15 own bodies, follow medical advice assiduously and ensure they consume all the correct
16 nutrients. Many hospitals and other institutions now provide maternal education classes
17 to convey this message to women (Zhu, 2010). Here biomedical understandings of 18 women's bodies, government concern with the quality of the population and increasing
19 consumerism converge. Zhu (2010, p.416) reports one woman spending half her monthly
20 income on a luxury brand of vitamins. The mothers of such women, brought up in a more
21 frugal era and producing their children without such supplements, found such extravagant
22 expenditure incomprehensible. In today's China, however, young women as desiring 23 subjects include in their desires the production of a quality child.
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45

46 China's social policies and political structures create a host of intimate injustices. The 47 hukou (household registration) system, which divides the population into urban and rural 48 residents and creates a social hierarchy favorable to the former, is a case in point. Wang's 49 (2017) study on dating violence in Beijing shows how the hukou system, the rural-urban 50 division and the difference between Beijinger and smalltowner may interact to create 51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 both opportunities and obstacles for young women in pursuing their sexual choices.
4
5 Gaetano, too, reports that young women migrants can exercise more choice over marriage
6
7 partners than if they remained at home, but that if they marry into urban households they 8
9 can often be stigmatized and maltreated by their in-laws and are perceived as inferior 10
11 outsiders (Gaetano, 2008). For this reason, as Gaetano notes, marriages between rural 12
13 women and urban men are uncommon, an issue discussed in detail in Lake Lui's (2016)
14
15 study of rural-urban inequality and intermarriage.
16
17
18

19
20 Lui (2016) examines the marriage market in urban China through the lens of 21
22 intersectionality to analyze how structural inequalities shape rural-urban intermarriage
23
24 preferences and opportunities. The research involved 134 individual interviews at various 25
26 sites in the migrant-receiving regions of Guangzhou and Shenzhen and rural villages in 27
28 migrant-sending regions in South China. Lui (2016) argues that this hierarchy, in turn,
29
30 creates a hukou-based gender system in which various types of masculinities and 31
32 femininities are constructed that guide preferences for intermarriage among different
33
34 groups. Urban masculinity is admired by most women, while rural migrant men find 35
36 urban femininity undesirable. Rural femininity is agreeable to most urban and rural 37
38 hukou holders, yet less so among local urban men for fear of status loss. She finds that 39
40 men who hold an urban hukou who marry rural migrants either live on the social margins
41
42 or are paired with rural wives who display urban ideals of beauty and manners,
43
44 compensating for their "rural" disadvantages. She thus concludes that rural-urban 45
46 boundaries are still strong in China. "Working within the hierarchies of hukou status and 47
48 gender, individuals embed macro-inequalities into their mate selection process." (Lui, 49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 2016, p.659) Thus intermarriage preferences illuminate the persistence of gender and 4
5 class inequalities in marriage.
6

7
8 A persistent feature of gendered sexual injustice, in China as elsewhere, is sexual 9
10 violence. There is research on this issue in China, but it is patchy. There is more on 11
12 domestic violence, seen as potentially disrupting family harmony (He & Ng, 2013; Hou
13
14 et al., 2012), than on rape and sexual harassment. Sexual violence against women and 15
16 children has become a touchy subject in China. It has become a problematic issue
17
18 because it has provided a focus for feminist activism, which is increasingly seen as 19
20 disruptive by the Party-state, hence the arrests and harassment of those campaigning on 21
22 such issues (Hong-Fincher, 2016). Two celebrated films demonstrate both the potential 23
24 and pitfalls of publicizing these issues (see Zeng, 2017).
25
26
27
28
29

30 In her film Garden in Heaven (2005) Ai Xiaoming, a feminist, university professor and 31
32 public intellectual, tracked the case of Huang Jing, a primary school teacher who was 33
34 found raped and murdered in her home after spending a night with her 26 year old 35
36 boyfriend. This documentary became a catalyst for activism against date rape. Chinese 37
38 feminists began to organize activities to support Huang's mother in her appeal for justice.
39
40 Soon scholars began to pay more attention to gender-based violence in China. Wang
41
42 Nanfu's 2016 documentary, Hooligan Sparrow is a testament to the dangers of 43
44 campaigning too actively against sexual violence. Ye Haiyan (aka Hooligan Sparrow)
45
46 organized protests about the sexual abuse of six schoolgirls, aged 11-13, by the school
47
48 principle and a local official, which took place in Hainan province. The campaign spread
49
50 and was successful in drawing attention to the issue and resulted in the prosecution of the 51
52 men involved. Ye Haiyan, however, was subjected to a lengthy campaign of persecution, 53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 repeatedly evicted and forced to move from city to city and imprisoned for defending
4 herself against a gang of armed thugs – all of which is recorded in Wang’s film. Wang,
5 too, was constantly harassed by the authorities, who tried to prevent her from filming, but
6 she managed to smuggle the film out of China (see Zeng, 2017).
7
8
9

10
11
12
13 There is an evident contradiction between the government’s opposition to feminist 14 activism, evident in this case and in the arrest of the feminist five (Fincher, 2016), and 15 China’s avowed support for advancing the cause of women. The CCP may have retreated
16 from the Maoist commitment to gender equality but it is a signatory to CEDAW and in 17 2015 Xi Jinping pledged to donate $10million to the UN to promote women’s rights,
18 along with promising money for girls’ education and women’s and children’s health
19 projects in developing countries. This could be seen as simply a cynical move to enhance 20 China’s image in the world but, in our view, it also reflects a limited perspective on what 21 women’s rights might be. Within China itself women’s interests continue to be cast as 22 equivalent to family interests, thus continuing to define women primarily as wives and 23 mothers – in addition to workers and, ideally, patriotic citizens (Guo, 2010). The Party-24 state is certainly not promoting ideas of sexual autonomy and, as we have seen, is 25 complicit in the sexualization of women and their continued subordination to and sexual 26 exploitation by men.
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45

46 Conclusion

47
48
49 In this article we have endeavored to convey a sense of what is happening in Chinese
50 sexual culture and practices, how sexual lives are changing and how, in particular, this 51 relates to the political scene. The political uses of sexuality in China have been noted by a 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 number of scholars in terms of managing the Chinese population, reinforcing the 4 importance of the family, inculcating socialist morality and defining normality and
5 deviance (e.g. Sigley, 2002, 2006; Wong, 2016). In its reproductive form it has been 6 used to manage population growth and quality, with particular impacts on the policing of 7 women's bodies (Greenhalgh & Winckler, 2005; McMillan, 2006; Xie, in press). Less 8 directly sexuality is integral to the new neoliberal gendered subjectivities produced by 9 economic modernization (Rofel, 2007; Zhang, 2015). In terms of the broader shifts in 10 sexual politics it has involved reconfigured masculinities and femininities, including the 11 sexualization of women and their positioning as objects of male sexual consumption (Liu, 12 2016; Song & Lee, 2010; Zheng, 2015). Sex is also intricately interwoven with the 13 political in its usage by individuals and groups at every level of society to make money, 14 to contribute to economic growth, for personal or political advancement and in political 15 struggles.

16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34 For government officials at local levels sexualized entertainment provides a means of 35 building relationships with the business community (Osburg, 2016; Uretsky, 2016). This 36 same set of practices provides the government with opportunities to demonstrate socialist 37 moral rectitude by purges against prostitution and prosecution of corrupt officials and 38 political enemies. At the same time the lucrative sex industry plays a part in keeping the 39 economy going, both directly and indirectly (Zurdnorfer, 2016), which is crucial to 40 maintaining the Party-state's legitimacy. Sex is also deployed as protest by political 41 activists, for example Ai Xiaoming's naked protests and Ye Haiyan's offer of free sex to 42 migrant workers to draw attention to conditions in low-end brothels and the deprivations
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 faced by male migrant workers. But sex and can also be used against them, to discredit
4
5 and shame them (Zeng, 2017).
6
7

8
9 In considering the political uses to which sex is put in China, it has become clear that,
10
11 despite the withdrawal of the state from regulating of much of personal life, the Party-12
13 state still has a major influence both on ordinary people's sexual lives and on the 14
15 scholarship produced from within China. Much of the writing on gender and sexuality in 16
17 China (Greenhalgh & Winckler, 2005; Rofel, 2007; Wong, 2016) has taken a 18
19 Foucauldian approach to governmentality, arguing for the construction of new desiring 20
21 but self-restraining, responsible subjects who can be counted on to govern themselves
22
23 without direct intervention from above. There is however, a tension between neoliberal 24
25 governance based on self-regulating subjects and recent moves back towards a more 26
27 authoritarian regime under Xi's presidency. In the Xi era the neoliberal form of 28
29 subjectification is being supplemented by increased repression by the Party-state 30
31 authorities. Self-regulation, it seems, is not deemed sufficient to guarantee compliant
32
33 Chinese subjects – they now need to be under more surveillance, told much more directly 34
35 what to think, feel, do and say and be prevented from, or punished for, doing or saying
36
37 anything that disrupts harmony or challenges the regime (Lampton, 2016; Ringen, 2016).
38
39 This is not to deny the continued importance of neoliberal governance; in many respects
40
41 most Chinese citizens are lured into compliance, or at least acceptance, by continuing to 42
43 pursue individual desires and goals, buying into, or hoping for, the benefits of material
44
45 comforts.
46
47
48
49
50
51

52
53 The construction of new sexual subjects in China takes place in a variety of arenas,
54
55 including sexological writings, popular culture, the promotion of consumerism, CCP
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 sponsored events and propaganda, and though the everyday practices of Chinese people.
4
5 These sexual subjects are, of course, gendered but not in any uniform way; gender
6
7 intersects with wider social differences and inequalities and is played out in varied ways
8
9 among those in differing sectors of society. While the ideal for both men and women 10
11 includes material success and the acquisition of cultural capital, markers of suzhi (quality)
12
13 and pinwei (taste), (Song & Lee, 2010) most will not achieve it given the scale of 14
15 inequality in China. Nonetheless dreams of becoming “modern” and cosmopolitan have 16
17 been recorded even among urban workers, migrant workers and migrant sex workers
18
19 (Ding, 2016; Gaetano, 2008; 2015; Pun, 2005; Rofel, 1999, 2005).
20
21
22
23

24
25 What we know of masculine subjects is uneven. Those who have received the most 26
27 attention are elite men and migrant men, and far more research exists about sexuality in 28
29 relation to the former, where masculinity is enacted partly through sexualized 30
31 consumption and sex can also express a man’s status and pinwei (Song & Lee, 2010).
32
33 Little is known about the intimate lives of the mass of Chinese men who do not fit into 34
35 these categories. Only in literature on tongzhi do we see men from different social 36
37 backgrounds (e.g. Zheng, 2015), though there is some recent work beginning to explore
38
39 the intimate lives of “ordinary” men (see Cao, 2017).
40
41
42
43

44
45 The ideal feminine subject in post-socialist China is the young, sexually attractive wife,
46
47 mother and successful career women. This has become an aspirational goal for many 48
49 Chinese women, which few will fully achieve; certainly most will not be as materially 50
51 privileged as they might hope to be (Guo, 2010). The “white-collar beauties” who tolerate
52
53 being sexualized in the workplace but can expect to enter the ranks of these ideal women,
54
55 provided they find a suitable husband soon enough and avoid the ignominy of being 56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 labelled as sheng nü (leftover women). Lower down the social scale, ordinary workers
4
5 and migrant workers may also harbor dreams of modernity and hope for happiness
6
7 through marriage and motherhood. Then there are those who threaten the marital 8
9 harmony of wives and mothers, including mistresses and ernai, the xiaosan (little three).
10
11 The xiaosan is an ambiguous figure, on the one hand the disreputable wrecker of 12
13 marriage, on the other an aspirational subject, using her sexual charm to buy into the 14
15 cosmopolitan, consumerist culture. She may be a status symbol for an elite male patron,
16
17 but she can also be used to discredit a corrupt official. Below the xiaosan in the hierarchy
18
19 of the sexual marketplace are the xiaojie (young ladies, sex workers), some aspiring to 20
21 become cosmopolitan women, some simply struggling to survive.
22
23
24
25

26
27 China's new sexual subjects have the freedom to govern their own lives provided they fit
28
29 into the harmonious society, stay within the law and continue to pursue personal 30
31 satisfactions without challenging the status quo. As long as they do not rock the boat they 32
33 may not even notice the increased authoritarianism unless or until they seek redress for a 34
35 grievance against the system. New measures for a "social credit scheme" proposed by the 36
37 Beijing government in 2014 threaten to further curtail citizens' freedoms to an extent that 38
39 might be difficult to ignore. The original document, circulated by the State Council to all 40
41 lower levels of government throughout the PRC in June 2014, focused on primarily on 42
43 regulating business, government, legal and other organizations in order to promote 44
45 trustworthiness and eliminate corruption, fraud, counterfeiting and general dishonesty.
46
47 Since then, more documents have been released on plans to use "big data" to monitor
48
49 Chinese citizens. According to reports in the western media, there have been concerns
50
51 about the ways this is being extended to include intrusive surveillance of every citizen,
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 gathering and collating every piece of information about them available online, to give
4 everyone a social credit score (Clover 2016; Denyer 2016a, 2016b). These reports
5 suggest they every misdemeanor from running a red light, to failing in filial obligations,
6 to criticizing the government on social media could be detrimental to an individual's
7 score. This, it is said, could affect everything from access to education to ability to travel
8 abroad – or even book a seat in a good restaurant. There are, however, doubts about its 9 technical feasibility, especially if it is to be fully implemented, as planned, by 2020.
10 Nonetheless the intent is clear: to increase control over private citizens. Some reports
11 suggest that the aim is “to return China to levels of personal surveillance common
12 between the 1950s and the 1970s, when everyone had files maintained by their work units
13 under Mao Zedong's regime” (Clover 2016). If implemented, this system, in conjunction 14 with other forms of control, would affect daily behavior and life choices, including 15 potentially sexual choices, and severely limit both personal and (already restricted)
16 academic freedom.
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35

36 In this climate of increasing censorship the lack of clarity about what is and what is not 37 permissible makes scholars and activists ever more cautious and likely to engage in self-
38 censorship. Chinese scholars are constrained by fear, censorship regulations, and the lack 39 of freedom to think and do things that are different or innovative. There are many things
40 that cannot be said, or are too risky to say. This helps to account for many of the 41 shortcomings in mainland Chinese research, which cannot be attributed to the superiority
42 of western concepts. Chinese language and culture is replete with concepts that could be
43 put to analytical use (Qi, 2014; Zhang, 2016), but it is mainly scholars outside China
44 whbring these concepts into a critical dialogue with western ones. Most of those within 45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 China play safe and confine themselves to exploring social issues only on the Party-
4 state's terms. Thus, as a discursive production, Chinese scholarship has been implicated
5 in producing the ideal sexual subject and in constructing dissident sexualities as 6 "problems" to be solved. Anything that is about diversity and alternative sexualities, if 7 framed other than negatively, is potentially subversive. It is certainly not possible to 8 implicate the state in sustaining sexual injustices. It is clear that the Chinese Party-state
9 would rather its academics, or citizens, did not fully exercise a "sociological imagination"
10 (Mills, 1959), to transform personal troubles into public issues – except perhaps those 11 issues that the state itself wants to address, such as ensuring that norms of filial piety keep 12 individuals responsible for the care of elderly relatives (see Qi, 2015). It certainly does 13 not want a feminist imagination that transforms the personal into the political.
14
15 Questioning authority is dangerous and is becoming more so.

16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31 As we were about to finish this article, we heard that "The Measures for the 32 Administration of the Publication of Audio-Visual Programs through the Internet or 33 Other Information Network," which came into force in October 2004, are being 34 tightened. On June 30, 2017, a set of new rules and regulations called shen he tong ze
35 (general rules on censorship) was passed. The controversial section 6 focuses on activities
36 that promote pornographic and bad taste representations, which are to be prohibited. They 37 include images and scenes of prostitution, promiscuity, rape, masturbation and abnormal
38 sexual relationships and behaviors, such as incest, homosexuality, sexual perversion, 39 unhealthy values on marriage, extra-marital relationships, one-night stands and sexual 40 liberation. Also included are sexually explicit images and seductive language. The 41 prominent sexuality scholar and campaigner, Li Yinhe (2017) quickly responded, 42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 publishing an online article. She is troubled by two issues: first, the constitutional right to
4 creative freedom will be affected; secondly, the rights of sexual minorities are threatened.
5
6 She argues that sexual needs, like the desire for food, are issues of livelihood and should 7
8 not be suppressed. While we would not endorse her essentialist assumptions about human 9
10 sexuality, she is correct to be concerned. These regulations could also affect academic 11
12 production and certainly our colleagues in Mainland China, who alerted us to these new 13
14 regulations, are afraid that they will severely restrict teaching and research on sexuality.
15
16 They tell us that the situation is worsening recently, even when compared to the 17
18 conditions we outlined earlier, and believe that things will become even more difficult for 19
20 them.
21
22
23
24
25

26
27 China's internet censorship not only affects material produced and circulating within 28
29 China but is also intended to block traffic from outside the country, reinforcing its "great 30
31 firewall" and sealing any cracks in it. Recently this has involved restricting the use of 32
33 foreign-based VPNs (virtual private networks) used by many international businesses
34
35 (see, for example, Hornby 2018). VPNs are also a means by which international NGOs
36
37 link members in different countries and enable overseas scholars conducting research in 38
39 China to keep in touch with their home institutions or Chinese scholars with affiliations 40
41 to foreign universities to access their systems and keep in touch with colleagues. This 42
43 may, in the near future, make it even harder for Chinese sexuality scholars to collaborate
44
45 with those based outside China.
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Given the challenges that Chinese scholars face, it is not surprising that it has been
4 western-based academics, including overseas Chinese, who are free to write more critical
5 accounts of sexual life in China, for example to expose the links between commercialized
6 sex and corruption in political and economic life and analyze the links between 7 “socialism with Chinese characteristics” and the continued restrictions on women.
8
9

10 Chinese scholars need to be far more circumspect. There is plenty of excellent work
11 produced by Chinese scholars, but this is placed in international journals and is often 12 authored by overseas Chinese scholars or those who have had a western education. If they 13 are based within China their future careers may not be promising as restrictions tighten 14 further, making it more difficult for new ideas and innovative scholarship to emerge in 15 China.
16
17
18

19 China’s censorship seems to run counter to one of its longer term aims: to promote world
20 class universities. To this end Chinese researchers are encouraged to publish in 21 international journals, but it is being made difficult for them to do so. In addition to the 22 practical problem of the dominance of English in the international arena – a heritage of 23 the colonial past that disadvantages all non-English speakers – Chinese scholars are 24 facing new obstacles. Recently there have been moves to restrict their access to 25 international scholarship. Since January 2015, the South China Morning Post (SCMP), a 26 Hong Kong based broadsheet, has been reporting on Chinese initiatives to restrict foreign 27 influences in its universities, including the use of foreign books, promulgated through 28 speeches by Xi Jinping and various government ministers and Party news outlets (Chen
29 and Zhuang 2015; Jun, 2016; Li, 2017). China has recently, in 2017, even pressured
30 major western publishers, such as Cambridge University Press and Springer, to remove 31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 “sensitive” content from their journals’ Chinese websites. While Cambridge reinstated
4 the censored material, Springer has complied with the Chinese authorities’ demands. If 5 Chinese scholars are limited in what they can read, restricted to thinking in terms of the 6 “correct” political line, and if they are unable or afraid to engage in the forms of critical
7 academic debate expected by international journals, they will not find it easy to have their 8 work accepted for publication – unless they stick to very safe uncontroversial issues. The 9 study of sexuality is not a safe area. In some Chinese universities, zealous party
10 secretaries are defining anything concerned with sexuality, or even gender, as too 11 “sensitive” for discussion in classrooms, thus impeding the education of new cohorts of 12 sexuality scholars.
13
14

15
16
17 As authors we are privileged by our location outside China. We are two Hong Kong
18 scholars, a British scholar and a Chinese scholar educated and currently based in the UK.
19 We therefore have the necessary language and conceptual knowledge to engage with 20 international scholarship and, importantly, academic freedom. But is the form of critical 21 knowledge we are endorsing simply a result of western bias? Concerns have emerged in 22 recent literature about western, Eurocentric and Anglophone bias in the social sciences
23 and the humanities (Bhambra & Santos, 2017; Connell, 2015; Jackson, 2008, 2015; 24 Jackson, Ho & Na 2013). We are aware that we have not done enough in this article to 25 question the western-centric concepts and theories deployed in studies of China’s sexual 26 culture and to challenge the cognitive injustices involved.
27
28

29
30
31 We would argue, however, that there is a need for a climate of academic freedom to 32 foster productive engagement between Chinese and foreign sexuality scholars and 33 promote alternative perspectives that embrace sexual diversity. This is difficult to 34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 accomplish at present, but there are things we can do and that scholars and activists inside
4
5 China are already doing. China's netizens are finding ways around the "great firewall"
6
7 and the restrictions it imposes on them. Creative uses of new media may enable Chinese
8
9 academics to find outlets for their work and also to engage in democratic forms of 10
11 knowledge production within China and well as knowledge exchanges with overseas 12
13 scholars. This may involve less traditional forms of academic research and writing.
14
15 Scholars outside China can help ensure that good critical scholarly work on sexuality
16
17 produced inside China is translated and disseminated through the means we have open to 18
19 us as editors of journals or through our contacts with publishers. There are numerous 20
21 young Chinese scholars currently being trained in sexuality studies in the USA, UK, 22
23 Hong Kong and elsewhere outside the PRC, to whom we owe responsibilities. We can 24
25 offer them the benefits of access to alternative ways of thinking and knowing and 26
27 democratic forms of knowledge production, which, in a small way, may help to counter
28
29 the restrictions imposed within China. This is not without its problems. Some of the 30
31 doctoral students currently being trained outside China have taken such messages on 32
33 board and are producing feminist and critical work on sexuality that is unlikely to be 34
35 palatable to the current Chinese regime. There are worries that some may encounter
36
37 difficulties on returning home. We need to find ways of supporting them, whether by 38
39 enabling them to stay overseas (e.g. through protected scholar programs, legal help to 40
41 claim asylum or by any means available) or, if they return to China, be ready to keep in 42
43 touch and campaign on their behalf if they should face persecution. These are not easy or 44
45 always feasible solutions. Whatever the problems, we should strive to keep 46
47 communication channels open as far as possible, perhaps learning from the courage and 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 inventiveness of China's netizen activists and continue, whenever possible to create 4
5 opportunities for dialogue with Chinese sexuality scholars.
6
7

8 9 References

- 10
11 Adkins, L. (1995). Gendered work: Sexuality, family and the labour market.
12 Buckingham: Open University Press.
13
14
15 Agustín, L. (2007). Sex at the margins: Migration, labour markets and the rescue
16 industry. London: Zed Books.
17
18
19 Allison, A. (1994). Nightwork: Sexuality, pleasure, and masculinity in a Tokyo hostess
20 club. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
21
22 Bao, H. (2015). Digital video activism: Narrating history and memory in Cui Zi'en's
23 'Queer China, Comrade China'. In: E. L. Engebretsen, W. F. Schroeder, & H. Bao
24 (Eds.), Queer/Tongzhi China: New perspectives on research, activism and media
25 (pp. 35-66) Copenhagen: University of Copenhagen NIAS Press.
26
27
28 Bao, H. (2016a). 'Same-Sex wedding', queer performance and spatial tactics in Beijing.
29 In: X. Lin, C. Haywood, and M. Mac An Ghail (Eds.), East Asian men:
30 Masculinity, sexuality and desire (pp.107-121). Basingstoke: Palgrave McMillan.
31
32
33 Bao, H. (2016b, August 22). Queer filmmaking in the People's Republic of China. [Blog
34 post]. Retrieved from https://cpianalysis.org/2016/08/22/queer-filmmaking-in-the-
35 peoples-republic-of-china/
36
37
38 Barbalet, J. (2017). Guanxi as social exchange: Emotions, power and corruption.
39 Sociology. Advanced online publication. doi:10.1177/0038038517692511
40
41 Barbalet, J. (2017). Guanxi as social exchange: Emotions, power and 42 corruption. Sociology. Advanced online publication. doi:
43 10.1177/0038038517692511
44
45
46 Bell, D. A. (2008) China's new Confucianism: Politics and everyday life in a changing
47 society. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
48
49
50 Bell, D. A. (2010) China's new Confucianism: Politics and everyday life in a changing
51 society. (with additional preface) Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
52
53
54 Bernstein, E. (2007a). Buying and selling the "girlfriend experience": The social and 55 subjective contours of market intimacy. In Padilla, M. B., Hirsh, J. S., Muñoz-
56 Laboy, M., Sember, R., & Parker, R. G. (Eds.), Love and globalization: 57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Transformation of intimacy in the contemporary world (pp.186-202). Nashville:
4 Vanderbilt University Press.
5

6
7 Bernstein, E. (2007b). Temporarily yours: Intimacy, authenticity, and the commerce of 8 sex. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
9

10
11 Bhambra, G. K., & Santos, B. S. (2017). Introduction: Global challenges for Sociology.
12 Sociology, 51(1), 3-10. doi: 10.1177/0038038516674665.

13
14 Bian, Y., & Zhang, L. (2014). Corporate social capital in Chinese guanxi culture. In D.
15 Brass, G. Labianca, A. Mehra, D. Halgin, & S. Borgatti (Eds.), Contemporary
16 perspectives on organizational social networks (pp.421-443). Bingley: Emerald
17 Group Publishing Limited.
18

19
20 Boittin, M. (2013). New perspectives from the oldest profession: Abuse and the legal 21 consciousness of sex workers in China. Law & Society Review, 47(2), 245-278. doi:
22 10.1111/lasr.12016
23

24
25 Burger, R. (2012). Behind the red door: Sex in China. Hong Kong: Earnshaw Books.
26

27
28 Cao, J., & Guo, L. (2016). Chinese “tongzhi” community, civil society, and online
29 activism. Communication and the Public, 1(4), 504-508. doi:
30 10.1177/2057047316683199

31
32 Cao, S. (2017). “Whingeing” husbands: men’s practices of intimacy and inequality in 33 urban China. Families, Relationships and Societies. Advanced online publication.
34 doi: 10.1332/204674317X15120405853453
35

36
37 Carrico, K. (2018). Academic freedom in Hong Kong: between two systems. Hong Kong
38 Watch report. Retrieved from:
39 https://static1.squarespace.com/static/58ecfa82e3df284d3a13dd41/t/5a65b8ece4966
40 ba24236ddd4/1516615925139/Academic+Freedom+report+%281%29.pdf
41

42
43 Chan, A. H. (2008). Talking about ‘good sex’: Hong Kong women’s sexuality in the 21st
44 Century. In S. Jackson, J. Liu & J. Woo (Eds.), East Asian sexualities: modernity,
45 gender and new sexual cultures (pp. 195-295). London: Zed Books.
46

47
48 Chan, L. (2017). The role of gay identity confusion and outness in sex-seeking on mobile
49 dating apps among men who have sex with men: A conditional process analysis.
50 Journal of Homosexuality, 64(5), 622-637. doi: 10.1080/00918369.2016.1196990
51

52
53 Chang, C., & Chen, M. (2012). Dependency, globalization and overseas sex-related 54 consumption by East Asians. International Journal of Tourism Research, 15(6), 55 521-534. doi: 10.1002/jtr.1872
56

- 1
2
3 Chen, A., & Zhuang, P. (2015, January 30). Chinese universities ordered to ban textbooks
4 that promote Western values. Universities told to clamp down on use of foreign
5 textbooks and criticism of the party. South China Morning Post. Retrieved from:
6 http://www.scmp.com/news/china/article/1695524/chinese-universities-instructed-
7 ban-textbooks-promote-western-values
8 9
- 10
11 Chen, M. (2017). Crossing borders to buy sex: Taiwanese men negotiating gender, class
12 and nationality in the Chinese sex industry. Sexualities. Advanced online
13 publication. doi: 10.1177/1363460716676989
14
- 15
16 Cheng, Y., Han, L., & Huang, Y. (2010). Health needs and risks among Chinese female
17 migrant workers: A qualitative assessment. In B. Gransow, & D. Zhou (Eds.),
18 Migrants and health in urban China (pp. 40-51). Berlin: LIT VERLAG.
19
- 20
21 Cheung, C., & Tsang, E. Y. (2015). Political-economic coalition among entrepreneurs,
22 professionals, and cadres in Guangdong, China. Sociological Research Online, 23 20(4). doi: 10.5153/sro.3798
24
- 25
26 Cheung, F. M., & Tang, C. S. K. (2017). Women's lives in contemporary Chinese 27 societies. In C. Brown, U. Gielen, J. Gibbons, & J. Kuriansky (Eds.), Women's 28 evolving lives (pp.19-38). New York: Springer, Cham.
29
- 30
31 Cheung, G. (2009). Hong Kong's watershed: The 1967 riots. Hong Kong: Hong Kong
32 University Press.
33
- 34
35 Cheung, K. C. (2012). Away from socialism, towards Chinese characteristics:
36 Confucianism and the futures of Chinese nationalism. China Information, 26(2), 37 205–218. doi: 10.1177/0920203X12440548
38
- 39
40 Cheung, O. (2013). Saliva, semen, and sanity: Flat-working women in Hong Kong and 41 bodily management strategies. In C. Wolkowitz, R. Cohen, T. Sanders, & K. Hardy
42 (Eds.), Body/sex/work: Intimate, embodied and sexualised labour (pp. 239-254).
43 Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
44
- 45
46 Chiang, H. (2010). Epistemic modernity and the emergence of homosexuality in China.
47 Gender and History, 22(3), 629-657. doi: 10.1111/j.1468-0424.2010.01612.x 48
- 49
50 Chin, K., & Finckenauer, J. (2012) Selling sex overseas: Chinese women and the realities
51 of prostitution and global sex trafficking. New York, NY: New York University
52 Press.
53
- 54
55 Cho, J. M. (2010). The journey of Hong Kong's tongzhi movement. Journal of Asian
56 Women's Resource Centre for Culture and Theology, 29(3), 4-9.
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Choi, S. Y. (2011a). State control, female prostitution and HIV prevention in China. The
4 China Quarterly, 205, 96-114. doi: 10.1017/S0305741010001414
5
6
7 Choi, S. Y. (2011b). Heterogeneous and vulnerable: The health risks facing transnational 8 female sex workers. Sociology of Health & Illness, 33(1), 33-49. doi:
9 10.1111/j.1467-9566.2010.01265.x
10
11 Choi, S. Y., & Luo, M. (2016). Performative family: Homosexuality, marriage and 12 intergenerational dynamics in China. The British Journal of Sociology, 67(2), 260-
13 280. doi: 10.1111/1468-4446.12196
14
15
16 Choi, Y.-p. S., & Peng, Y. (2016). Masculine compromise: Migration, family, and gender
17 in China. California: University of California Press.
18
19
20 Chou, W.-s. (2000). Tongzhi: Politics of same-sex eroticism in Chinese societies. New 21 York: Haworth Press.
22
23
24 Clover, C. (2016, January 19). China: when big brother meets big data. Financial Times.
25 Retrieved from:
26 <https://www.ft.com/content/b5b13a5e-b847-11e5-b151-8e15c9a029fb>
27
28
29 Connell, R. (2015). Meeting at the edge of fear: Theory on a world scale. Feminist
30 Theory, 16(1), 49-66. doi: 10.1177/1464700114562531
31
32
33 Davis, D. (2010). Who gets the house? Renegotiating property rights in post-socialist
34 urban China. Modern China, 36(5), 463-492. doi: 10.1177/0097700410373265 35
36
37 Davis, D. (2014). On the limits of personal autonomy: PRC law and the institution of 38 marriage. In D. Davis and S. Friedman (Eds) *Wives, husbands and lovers:
39 Marriage and sexuality in Hong Kong, Taiwan and Urban China* (pp. 41-61).
40 Stanford CA: Stanford University Press.
41
42
43 Deng, X. (1982, September 1). Opening speech at the twelfth national congress of the 44 Communist Party of China. People's Daily. Retrieved from 45 <http://english.peopledaily.com.cn/dengxp/vol3/text/c1010.html>.
46
47
48 Denyer, S. (2016a, October 22). China's plan to organize its society relies on 'big data' to 49 rate everyone. Washington Post. Retrieved from:
50 https://www.washingtonpost.com/world/asia_pacific/chinas-plan-to-organize-its-whole-society-around-big-data-a-rating-for-everyone/2016/10/20/1cd0dd9c-9516-11e6-ae9d-0030ac1899cd_story.html?utm_term=.bd35af621266
51
52
53 Denyer, S. (2016b, October 22). China wants to give all of its citizens a score – and their 54 rating could affect every area of their lives. The Independent. Retrieved from:
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 http://www.independent.co.uk/news/world/asia/china-surveillance-big-data-score-
4 censorship-a7375221.html
5

6
7 Ding, Q., & Zhang, H. (2014). Zhi chang xing sao rao yu nv xing lao dong zhe quan yi de
8 fa lv bao hu [Workplace sexual harassment and the legal protection of female
9 labors' rights and benefits]. Public Administration & Law, 7, 101-106.
10

11
12 Ding, Y. (2012). Negotiating intimacies in an eroticized environment: Xiaojies and south
13 China entertainment business. International Journal of Business Anthropology, 14 3(1), 138-175.
15

16
17 Ding, Y. (2016). Zhusanjiao liudong renkou shequn teshu zhiye yanjiu [Desires:
18 Transitions and New Possibilities of Sex Work in the Pearl River Delta Area.]
19 Beijing: Social Sciences Academic Press.
20

21
22 Ding, Y., & Ho, P. S. Y. (2008). Beyond sex work: An analysis of Xiaojies'
23 understandings of work in the Pearl River Delta Area, China. In S. Jackson, J. Liu, 24 & J. Woo. (Eds.), East Asian sexualities: Modernity, gender & new sexual cultures
25 (pp. 123-138). London: Zed Books.
26

27
28 Ding, Y., & Ho, P. S. Y. (2013). Sex work in China's Pearl River Delta: Accumulating
29 sexual capital as a life-advancement strategy. Sexualities, 16(1-2), 43-60. doi:
30 10.1177/1363460712466211
31

32
33 Du, J., Wang, Y., & Zhang, Y. (2015). Sex imbalance, marital matching and intra-
34 household bargaining: Evidence from China. China Economic Review, 35, 197-218.
35 doi: 10.1016/j.chieco.2014.11.002
36

37
38 Engebretsen, E. (2014). Queer women in urban China: An ethnography. London:
39 Routledge.
40

41
42 Engebretsen, E. (2017). Under pressure: Lesbian-gay contract marriages and their 43 patriarchal bargains. In G. Santos & S. Harrell (Eds.), Transforming patriarchy:
44 Chinese families in the 21st century (pp. 163-181). Seattle: University of 45 Washington Press.
46

47
48 Erni, J. (2016). Internet sex chatting and "vernacular masculinity" among Hong Kong
49 youth. In J. Coffey, S. Budgeon & H. Cahill (Eds.), Learning bodies: The body in 50 youth and childhood studies. New York, NY: Springer.
51

52
53 Evans, H. (1997). Women and sexuality in China: Dominant discourses of female
54 sexuality and gender since 1949. Cambridge: Polity Press.
55
56
57

- 1
2
3 Evans, H. (2008). Sexed bodies, sexualised identities, and the limits of gender. China
4 Information, 22(2), 361-386. doi: 0.1177/0920203X08091550
5
6
7 Evans, H. (2010). The gender of communication: Changing expectations of mothers and 8 daughters in urban China. The China Quarterly, 204, 980-1000. doi:
9 10.1017/S0305741010001050
10
11 Farrer, J. (2002). Opening up: Youth sex culture and market reform in Shanghai.
12 Chicago; London: University of Chicago Press.
13
14
15 Farrer, J. (2010). A foreign adventurer's paradise? Interracial sexuality and alien sexual 16 capital in reform era Shanghai. Sexualities, 13(1), 69-95. doi:
17 10.1177/1363460709352726
18
19 20 Farrer, J. (2011). Global nightscapes in Shanghai as ethnosexual contact zones. The 21 Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 37(5), 747-764. doi:
22 10.1080/1369183X.2011.559716
23
24
25 Farrer, J. (2014). China wants you: The social construction of skilled labor in three 26 employment sectors. Asian and Pacific Migration Journal, 23(4), 397-420.
27
28
29 Feng, W., Gu, B., & Cai, Y. (2016). The end of China's one-child policy. Studies in 30 Family Planning, 47(1), 83-86. doi: 10.1111/j.1728-4465.2016.00052
31
32 Fincher, L. (2016). China's feminist five. Dissent, 63(4), 84-90.
33
34
35 Fong, V. (2004). Only hope: Coming of age under China's one-child policy. Stanford,
36 CA: Stanford University Press.
37
38
39 Foucault, M. (1981). The history of sexuality: Volume 1. Harmondsworth: Penguin
40 Books.
41
42
43 Gaetano, A. (2008). Sexuality in diasporic space: Rural-to-urban migrant women 44 negotiating gender and marriage in contemporary China. Gender Place and 45 Culture, 15(6), 629-645. doi: 10.1080/09663690802518545
46
47
48 Gaetano, A. M. (2015). Out to work: Migration, gender, and the changing lives of rural 49 women in contemporary China. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
50
51
52
53 Gagnon, J. & Simon, W. (2004). Sexual Conduct (2nd ed.). New York: Aldine de
54 Gruyter.
55
56
57 Gagnon, J., & Simon, W. (1974). Sexual Conduct. London: Hutchinson.
58
59
60 Gao, G. (1995). Comparative research on hooliganism. Chinese Sociology and Anthropology, 27(3), 64-78.

- 1
2
3 Gao, X. (1994) China's modernization and changes to the status of rural women. In C. K.
4 Gilmartin, & G. Hershatter. (Eds.), Engendering China: Women, culture and the 5 state (pp.80-100). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
6
7
8 Giddens, A. (1992). The transformation of intimacy: Sexuality, love and eroticism in 9 modern societies. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press.
10
11 Gil, V. E., & Anderson, A. F. (1998). State-sanctioned aggression and the control of 12 prostitution in the people's republic of china. Aggression and Violent Behavior,
13 3(2), 129-142. doi: 10.1016/S1359-1789(97)00008-6
14
15 Goodstadt, L. F. (2015). Poverty in the midst of affluence: How Hong Kong mismanaged
16 its prosperity. Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press.
17
18 Greenhalgh, S., & Winckler, E. A. (2005). Governing China's population: From Leninist
19 to neoliberal biopolitics. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
20
21
22 Guo, L. (2014, February 20). China prostitution crackdown: The economic impact.
23 Financial Times. Retrieved from http://blogs.ft.com/beyond-
24 brics/2014/02/20/china-prostitution-crackdown-the-economic-impact/?mhq5j=e2.
25
26
27 Guo, Y. (2010). China's celebrity mothers: Female virtues, patriotism and social 28 harmony. In L. Edwards and E. Jeffreys (Eds.), Celebrity in China (pp.45-66).
29 Hong Kong: HKU Press.
30
31
32 Hartig, F. (2012). Confucius institutes and the rise of China. Journal of Chinese Political 33 Science, 17(1), 53-76.
34
35
36 Harvey, D. (2005). A brief history of neoliberalism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
37
38 He, X., & Hang Ng, K. (2013). In the name of harmony: The erasure of domestic 39 violence in China's judicial mediation. International Journal of Law, Policy and 40 the Family, 27(1), 97-115. doi: 10. 1093/lawfam/ebs014
41
42
43 Hesketh, T., Zhou, X., & Wang, Y. (2015). The end of the one-child policy: Lasting
44 implications for China. JAMA, 314(24), 2619-2620. doi: 10.1001/jama.2015.16279
45
46
47 Hildebrandt, T. (2011). Same-sex marriage in China? The strategic promulgation of a 48 progressive policy and its impact on LGBT activism. Review of International
49 Studies, 37(3), 1313-1333.
50
51
52 Hinsch, B. (1990). Passions of the cut sleeve. California: University of California Press.
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Hinsch, B. (1990). Passions of the cut sleeve: The male homosexual tradition in China.
4 Berkeley: University of California Press.
5
- 6
7 Ho, P. S. Y. (2006). The (charmed) circle game: Reflections on sexual hierarchy through 8 multiple sexual relationships. Sexualities, 9(5), 549-566. doi:
9 10.1177/1363460706069966
10
- 11
12 Ho, P. S. Y. (2008). Not so great expectations: Sex and housewives in Hong Kong.
13 Journal of Sex Research, 45(4), 338-349. doi:
14 10.1080/0022449080239834010.1080/00224490802398340
15
- 16
17 Ho, P. S. Y. (2012). Hong Kong men's stories of intra-national cross border romances.
18 Asia Pacific Journal of Social Work and Development, 22(3), 176-186. doi:
19 10.1080/02185385.2012.691717
20
- 21
22 Ho, P. S. Y. (2014). An embarrassment of riches: Good men behaving badly in Hong 23 Kong. In D. S. Davis & S. L. Friedman (Eds.), *Wives, husbands, and lovers:
24 Marriage and sexuality* (pp. 165- 188). Stanford CA: Stanford University Press.
25
- 26
27 Ho, P. S. Y., & Hu, Y. (2016). Pray the gay away: Identity conflict between Christianity
28 and sexuality in Hong Kong sexual minorities. Gender Place, and Culture, 23(12),
29 1725-1737. doi: 10.1080/0966369X.2016.1249348
30
- 31
32 Ho, P. S. Y., Jackson, S., & Kong, S. S. T. (2017). Speaking against silence: Finding a 33 voice in Hong Kong Chinese families through the Umbrella Movement', Sociology.
34 Advanced online publication. doi: 10.1177/003803851772664
35
- 36
37 Hoang, K. (2015). Dealing in desire: Asian ascendancy, Western decline, and the hidden 38 currencies of global sex work. Oakland, CA: University of California Press.
39
- 40
41 Hong-Fincher, L. (2014). Leftover women: The resurgence of gender inequality in China.
42 London: Zed Books.
43
- 44
45 Hornby, L. (2018, January 22). China's VPN crackdown is about money as much as 46 censorship. Financial Times. Retrieved from:
47 <https://www.ft.com/content/35eafc9a-fcf8-11e7-9b32-d7d59aace167>
48
- 49
50 Hou, J., Yu, L., Ting, S., Sze, Y., & Fang, X. (2011) The status and characteristics of 51 couple violence in China, Journal of Family Violence, 26(2), 81-92. doi:
52 10.1007/s10896-010-9343-3
53
- 54
55 Huang, Y., & Pan, S. (2009). Zhongguo she hui diao cha zhong de yan jiu lun li: Fang fa
56 lun ceng ci de fan si [Research ethics in social surveys in China: Methodological 57 reflections]. Social Sciences in China, 2, 149-162.
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Jackson, S. (2015) Modernity/modernities and personal life: reflections on some
4 theoretical lacunae. Korean Journal of Sociology, 49(3), 1-20.
5
6 Jackson, S. (2006). Gender, sexuality and heterosexuality: The complexity (and limits) of 7 heteronormativity' Feminist Theory, 7(1), 105-121. doi:
8 10.1177/1464700106061462
9
10
11 Jackson, S., & Scott, S. (2010). Theorizing sexuality. Maidenhead: Open University
12 Press.
13
14
15 Jackson, S., Ho, P. S. Y. and Na, J. N. (2013). Reshaping tradition? Women negotiating 16 the boundaries of tradition and modernity in Hong Kong and British families. The 17 Sociological Review, 61(4), 667-688. doi: 10.1111/1467-954X.12077
18
19
20 Jackson, S., Liu, J and Woo, J. (2008) 'Introduction: reflections on gender, modernity and 21 East Asian sexualities', in S. Jackson, J. Liu & J. Woo (eds) East Asian Sexualities:
22 Gender, Modernity and New Sexual Cultures. London: Zed Books, pp. 1-30.
23
24
25 Jankowiak, W., & Li, X. (2014). The decline of the chauvinistic model of Chinese
26 masculinity: A research report. Chinese Sociological Review, 46(4), 3-18. doi:
27 10.2753/CSA2162-0555460401
28
29
30 Jeffreys, E. (2004). China, sex and prostitution. London: Routledge.
31
32 Jeffreys, E. (2010a). Regulating private affairs in contemporary China: Private 33 investigators and the policing of spousal infidelity. China Information, 24(2), 149–
34 167. doi: 10.1177/0920203X09356047
35
36
37 Jeffreys, E. (2010b). Exposing police corruption and malfeasance: China's virgin
38 prostitutes cases. The China Journal, 63, 127-149. doi: 10.1086/tcj.63.20749197
39
40
41 Jeffreys, E. (2012). Prostitution scandals in China: Policing, media and society. London, 42 New York: Routledge.
43
44
45 Jeffreys, E., & Yu, H. (2015). Sex in China. Cambridge: Polity.
46
47
48 Jensen, L. M. (2009). Sexuality and behavior. In E. L. Davis (Ed.), Encyclopedia of 49 contemporary Chinese culture (pp.532-535). New York: Routledge.
50
51
52 Jiang, L., Zhu, X., Yan, J., Liu, Y., Lin, F., & Zhang, T. (2012). Shanghai shin v xing
53 gong zuo zhe de sheng cun zhi liang yu yi yu xian zhuang [Research on the life
54 quality and depression status among female sex workers in Shanghai]. Chinese
55 Journal of Aids and STD, 20(2), 95-98.
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3
4
5 .Jun, M. (2016, December 10). Xi calls for more thought control on China's campuses.
6 South China Morning Post. Retrieved from:
7 http://www.scmp.com/news/china/policies-politics/article/2053362/xi-calls-more-
8 thought-control-chinas-campuses
9
10
11 Kam, L. Y. (2010). Opening up marriage: Married lalas in Shanghai. In C. Yau (Ed.) As 12 normal as possible: Negotiating gender and sexuality in mainland China and Hong 13 Kong (pp.87-102). Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press.
14
15 Kam, L. Y. (2013). Shanghai lalas: Female tongzhi community and politics in urban 16 China. Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press.
17
18 Kam, L. Y. (2014). Desiring T, desiring self: "T-style" pop singers and lesbian culture in 19 China. Journal of Lesbian Studies, 18(3), 252-65. doi:
20 10.1080/10894160.2014.896613
21
22 Khor, D., & Kamano, S. (2006). "Lesbians" in East Asia: Diversity, identities, and 23 resistance. Binghamton, N.Y.: Harrington Park Press.
24
25 Ko, K., & Weng, C. (2012). Structural changes in Chinese corruption. The China
26 Quarterly, 211, 718-740. doi:10.1017/S0305741012000793
27
28 Kong, T. S. (2011). Chinese male homosexualities: Memba, tongzhi and golden boy.
29 London: Routledge.
30
31 Kong, T. S. (2012). Reinventing the self under socialism: The case of migrant male sex
32 workers ("money boys") in China. Critical Asian Studies, 44 (2), 283–308. doi:
33 10.1080/14672715.2012.672829
34
35 Kong, T. S. (2015). Romancing the boundary: Client masculinities in the Chinese sex
36 industry. Culture, Health & Sexuality, 17(7), 810-814. doi:
37 10.1080/14672715.2012.672829
38
39 Kong, T. S. (2016). The sexual in Chinese sociology: Homosexuality studies in 40 contemporary China. The Sociological Review, 64(3), 495–514. doi: 10.1111/1467-
41 954X.12372
42
43 Kwok, C., & Chan, N. K. (2017) Legitimacy and forced democratisation in social 44 movements: A case study of the Umbrella Movement in Hong Kong. China
45 Perspectives, 3, 7-16.
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Lahtinen, A. (2015). China's soft power: Challenges of Confucianism and Confucius
4 institutes. Journal of Comparative Asian Development, 14(2), 200-226. doi:
5 10.1080/15339114.2015.1059055
6
7
8 Lampton, D. M. (2016). China: Challenger or challenged? The Washington Quarterly, 9 39(3), 107-119. doi: 10.1080/0163660X.2016.1232638
10
11 Lau, H., Yeung, G., Stotzer, R. L., Lau, C. Q., & Loper, K. (2017). Assessing the tongzhi
12 laborer: Self-identification and public opinion. Journal of Homosexuality, 64(4), 509-
13 522. doi: 10.1080/00918369.2016.1191241
14
15
16 Lee, E. W. (2004). Introduction: Gender and change in Hong Kong. In E. W. Lee (Ed.), 17 Gender and change in Hong Kong: Globalization, postcolonialism, and Chinese
18 patriarchy (pp. 3-22). Hawaii: University of Hawaii Press.
19
20
21 Lee, S. (2008). The office party: Corporate sexual culture and sexual harassment in the 22 South Korean workplace. In S. Jackson, J. Liu, & Woo, J. (Eds.), East Asian
23 sexualities: Modernity, gender & new sexual cultures (pp. 69-84). London, United 24 Kingdom: Zed.
25
26
27 Leung, J. (2015, April 20). Xi's corruption crackdown. Foreign Affairs, 94, 33-38.
28
29
30 Li, A.J. (2017, August 25). As Communist Party censors ban all criticism in China's 31 classrooms, what remains? South China Morning Post. Retrieved from:
32 http://www.scmp.com/comment/insight-opinion/article/2108246/communist-party-
33 censors-ban-all-criticism-chinas-classrooms
34
35
36 Li, J. C. (2012). Violence against Chinese female sex workers in Hong Kong: From 37 understanding to prevention. International Journal of Offender Therapy and 38 Comparative Criminology, 57(5), 613-631. doi: 10.1177/0306624X12438365
39
40
41 Li, Y. (2008). Chinese women's stories of love, marriage and sexuality. In S. Jackson, J.
42 Liu, & J. Woo. (Eds.), East Asian sexualities: Modernity, gender & new sexual 43 cultures (pp. 178-194). London: Zed Books.
44
45
46 Li, Y. (2009). Hou cun de nv ren men: Nong cun xing bie quan li guan xi [Women in Hou
47 village: Sexual relations and gender power in rural China]. Inner Mongolia: Inner 48 Mongolia University Publishing House.
49
50
51 Li, Y., & Wang, X. (1992). Ta men de shijie [Their world]. Taiyuan: Shanxi People
52 Publishing House.
53
54
55 Liu Jen-peng and Ding Naifei (2005) Reticent politics, queer politics. Inter-Asia Cultural 56 Studies, 6 (1): 30-55. doi: 10.1080/1462394042000326897
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Liu, J. (2007). Gender and work in urban China: Women workers of the unlucky
4 generation. London: Routledge.
5
6
7 Liu, J. (2008). Sexualized labour? “White-collar beauties” in provincial China. In S.
8 Jackson, J. Liu & J. Woo (Eds.), East Asian sexualities: Modernity, gender and new 9 sexual cultures (pp. 85-103). London: Zed Books.
10
11
12 Liu, J. (2016). Gender, sexuality and power in Chinese companies: Beauties at work.
13 London: Palgrave Macmillan.
14
15 Liu, J. (2017). Intimacy and intergenerational relations in rural China. Sociology, 51(5), 16 1034-1049. doi:10.1177/0038038516639505
17
18 Liu, M. (2011). Lun nv zhi gong te shu bao hu li fa de xin li nian [On the new ideas of 19 legislation on special protection for female workers]. Journal of China Women’s
20 University, 5, 5-10.
21
22 Liu, M. (2013). Two gay men seeking two lesbians: An analysis of xinghun (formality 23 marriage) ads on China’s Tianya.cn. Sexuality & Culture, 17(3), 495-511. doi:
24 10.1007/s12119-012-9164-z.
25
26
27 Liu, X. (2002). The otherness of self: A genealogy of the self in contemporary China. Ann
28 Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
29
30
31 Liu, Z. (2012). Lun dui hun nei xing bao li shou bao fun v de she hui zhi chi [Marital 32 sexual violence and the social support system]. Journal of China Women’s
33 University, 1, 33-37.
34
35
36 Louie, K. (2002). Theorising Chinese masculinity: Society and gender in China.
37 Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
38
39
40 Lowe, J., & Tsang, E. Y. (2017). Disunited in ethnicity: The racialization of Chinese
41 mainlanders in Hong Kong. Patterns of Prejudice, 51(2), 137-158. doi:
42 10.1080/0031322X.2017.1304349
43
44
45 Lui, L. (2016). Sexual harassment of women in China: The role of liberal sexual 46 attitudes. Social Transformations in Chinese Societies, 12(2), 181-196. doi:
47 10.1108/STICS-08-2016-0014
48
49
50 Mann, S. (2011). Gender and sexuality in modern Chinese history. Cambridge:
51 Cambridge University Press.
52
53
54 Mason, K. (2013). To your health! Toasting, intoxication and gendered critique among 55 banqueting women. The China Journal, 69: 108-133. doi: 10.1086/668804
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 McBride, R. (2017, January 1). New Chinese law tightens control over NGOs.
4 ALJAZEERA. Retrieved from http://www.aljazeera.com/news/2017/01/china-ngo-
5 law-170101083414954.html.
6
7
8 McMillan, J. (2006). Sex, science and morality in China. London: Routledge.
9
10 Mills, C. (1959). The sociological imagination. New York: Oxford University Press.
11
12 Monk-Turner, E., & Turner, C. (2010). Subjective well-being among those who exchange
13 sex and money, Yunnan, China and Thailand. Social Indicators Research, 99(1), 14 13-23. doi: 10.1007/s11205-009-9568-9
15
16
17 Osburg, J. (2013). Anxious wealth: Money and morality among China's new rich.
18 Stanford, CA.: Stanford University Press.
19
20
21 Osburg, J. (2016). Corruption, masculinity and jianghu ideology in the PRC. In L. Kam
22 (Ed.), Changing Chinese masculinities: From imperial pillars of state to global real
23 men (pp. 157-172). Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press.
24
25
26 Otis, E. (2008). Beyond the industrial paradigm: Consumer markets and the gender 27 politics of labor in China's globalized service workplaces. American Sociological
28 Review, 73(1), 15-36. doi: 10.1177/000312240807300102
29
30
31 Otis, E. (2012). Markets and bodies: Women, service work, and the making of inequality
32 in China. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
33
34
35 Otis, E. (2016a). Bridgework: Globalization, gender, and service labor at a luxury hotel.
36 Gender and Society, 30(6), 912-34. doi: 10.1177/0891243216674919
37
38
39 Otis, E. (2016b). China's beauty proletariat: Body rules and the formation of embodied
40 hegemony in a retail cosmetics' department. Positions: Asia Critique 24(1), 155-
41 177. doi: 10.1215/10679847-3320089
42
43
44 Pan S. (2006). Transformations in the primary life cycle: The origins and nature of 45 China's sexual revolution. In E. Jeffreys (Ed.), Sex and sexuality in China (pp.21-46 42). London: Routledge.
47
48
49 Pan, S. (1993). A sex revolution in current China. Journal of Psychology and Human
50 Sexuality, 6(2), 1-14. doi: 10.1300/J056v06n02_01
51
52
53 Pan, S., & Huang, Y. (2007). Zhuti jiangou: Xing shehui xue yanjiu shijiao de geming ji 54 bentu fazhan kongjian [Subjective Constructionism: Revolutionary and Local 55 Development of the Perspectives of Sociology of Sexuality], Sociological Studies, 56 3, 174-193.
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Pan, S., & Huang, Y. (2013). Xing zhi bian—21 shi ji zhongguo ren de xing sheng huo
4 [The change of sex – Chinese people’s sexual lives in the 21st century]. Beijing:
5 China Renmin University Press.
6
7
8 Pan, S., Parish, W., & Huang, Y. Y. (2011). Clients of female sex workers: A population-
9 based survey of China. Journal of Infectious Diseases, 204 (sup 5), 1211–1217.
10 DOI: 10.1093/infdis/jir537.
11
12
13 Parish, W., & Whyte, M. (1978). Village and family in contemporary China. Chicago:
14 University of Chicago Press.
15
16
17 Pei, Y. & Ho, P. S. Y. (2009). Gender, self and pleasure: The analysis of young women’s 18 discourse on masturbation in contemporary Shanghai. Culture, Health & Sexuality,
19 11(5), 515-528. doi: 10.1080/13691050902912775
20
21
22 Pei, Y. X., Ho, P. S. Y., & Ng, M. L. (2007). Studies on women’s sexuality in China
23 since 1980: A critical review. Journal of Sex Research, 44(2), 202-212. doi:
24 10.1080/13691050902912775
25
26
27 Plummer, K. (1995). Telling sexual stories: Power, change, and social worlds. London;
28 New York: Routledge.
29
30
31 Pun, N. (2005). Made in China: Women factory workers in a global workplace. Durham:
32 Duke University Press.
33
34
35 Qi, X. (2013). Guanxi, social capital theory and beyond: Toward a globalized social 36 science. The British Journal of Sociology, 64(2), 308-324. doi:10.1111/1468-
37 4446.12019
38
39
40 Qi, X. (2015). Filial obligation in contemporary China: Evolution of the culture-system.
41 Journal for the Theory of Social Behaviour, 45(1), 141-161. doi: 10.1111/jtsb.12052
42
43
44 Ren, X. (1999). Prostitution and economic modernization in China. Violence Against 45 Women, 5(12), 1411-1436. doi:10.1177/10778019922183453
46
47
48 Ringen, S. (2016). The perfect dictatorship: China in the 21st century. Hong Kong: Hong 49 Kong University Press.
50
51
52 Rofel, L. (2007). Desiring China: Experiments in neoliberalism, sexuality and public
53 culture. Durham: Duke University Press.
54
55
56 Rofel, L. (2010). The traffic in money boys. Positions: East Asian Cultures Critique, 57 18(2), 425-458. doi: 10.1215/10679847-2010-009
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Sang, T.-l. D. (2003). The emerging lesbian: Female same-sex desire in modern China.
4 Chicago: Chicago University Press.
5
6
7 Seidman, S. (2003). The social construction of sexuality (1st ed.). New York: W. W.
8 Norton.
9
10 Seidman, S. 2015. The Social Construction of Sexuality (3rd ed.). New York: W. W.
11 Norton
12
13 Sevastopulo, D. (2014, February 17). China launches crackdown on prostitution, betting
14 and drugs. Financial Times. Retrieved from https://www.ft.com/content/0264ae06-
15 9781-11e3-809f-00144feab7de?siteedition=intl.
16
17
18 Shao, H. (2014, February 21). China's crackdown on sex trade: An anti-corruption
19 campaign in disguise?. Forbes. Retrieved from 20 https://www.forbes.com/sites/hengshao/2014/02/21/chinas-crackdown-on-sex-
21 trade-an-anti-corruption-campaign-in-disguise/#f06ae9c2f815.
22
23
24 Shen, H. (2008). Becoming the 'first wives': gender, intimacy and the regional economy
25 across the Taiwan Strait. In S. Jackson, J. Liu & J. Woo (Eds.), East Asian 26 sexualities: modernity, gender and new sexual cultures (pp. 216-235). London:
27 Zed Books.
28
29
30 Shen, H. (2014). Staying in marriage across the Taiwan strait: Gender, Migration, and 31 transnational family. In D. S. Davis, & S. L. Friedman (Eds.), Wives, husbands, and 32 lovers: Marriage and sexuality in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and urban China (pp.262-33 284). Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
34
35
36 Shu, X., Zhu, Y., & Zhang, Z. (2013). Patriarchy, resources, and specialization: Marital 37 decision-making power in urban China. Journal of Family Issues, 34(7), 885-917.
38 doi: 10.1177/0192513x12450001
39
40
41 Sigley, G. (2002). Keeping it in the family: Government, marriage and sex in 42 contemporary China. In M. Jolly & K. Ram (Eds.), Borders of being: Citizenship,
43 fertility, and sexuality in Asia and the Pacific (pp.118-153). Ann Arbor: University
44 of Michigan Press.
45
46
47 Sigley, G. (2006). Sex, Politics and the policing of virtue in the People's Republic of 48 China. In E. Jeffreys (Ed.), Sex and Sexuality in China (pp. 43-61). New York:
49 Routledge.
50
51
52 Solé-Farràs, J. (2008). Harmony in contemporary New Confucianism and in socialism
53 with Chinese characteristics. China Media Research, 4(4), 14-24.
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Song, G., & Lee, T. (2010). Consumption, class formation and sexuality: Reading men's 4 lifestyle magazines in China. China Journal, 64, 159-177.
5
6
7 Suen, Y. T. (2015). What's gay about being single? A qualitative study of the lived
8 experiences of older single gay men. Sociological Research Online, 20(3). doi:
9 10.5153/sro.3716
10
11 Suen, Y. T. (2016). Older single gay men's body talk: Resisting and rigidifying the ageing
12 discourse in the gay community. Journal of Homosexuality, 64(3), 397-414. doi:
13 10.1080/00918369.2016.1191233
14
15
16 Suen, Y. T. (2017). Challenging the "majority support" argument on not introducing an 17 antidiscrimination legislation on the ground of sexual orientation in Hong Kong.
18 Hong Kong Law Journal, 47(2), 421-444.
19
20
21 Sun, J. & Mei, H. (2011). Wang luo wen xue se qing hua de biao xian ji qi dui qing shao
22 nian de wei hai [The forms of network literary pornography and Its harm to 23 teenagers], Journal of Southwest Jiaotong University (Social Sciences), 12(6), 68-
24 73.
25
26
27 Sung, S., & Pascall, G. (2014). Gender and welfare states in East Asia: Confucianism or 28 gender equality? New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
29
30
31 Tang, D. T. (2009). Demand for cultural representation: Emerging independent film and 32 video on lesbian desires. In O. Khoo & S. Metzger (Eds.), Futures of Chinese
33 cinema Technologies and temporalities in Chinese screen cultures (pp. 169-189).
34 Chicago: Intellect.
35
36
37 Tang, D. T. (2011). Conditional spaces: Hong Kong lesbian desires and everyday life.
38 Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press.
39
40
41 Tang, D. T. (2014b). Perspectives on same-sex sexualities and self-harm amongst service
42 providers and teachers in Hong Kong. Sex Education: Sexuality, Society and 43 Learning, 14(4), 444-456. doi: 10.1080/14681811.2014.920249
44
45
46 The Economist (2014, February 14). Prostitution in China: Crackdown on sex city.
47 Retrieved from http://www.economist.com/blogs/analects/2014/02/prostitution-
48 china
49
50
51 The Family Planning Association of Hong Kong (2014). Report of youth sexuality study
52 2011. Hong Kong: The Family Planning Association of Hong Kong.
53
54
55 To, S. (2013). Understanding sheng nü ("leftover women"): The phenomenon of late
56 marriage among Chinese professional women. Symbolic Interaction, 36(1), 1-20.
57 doi: 10.1002/SYMB.46
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 To, S. (2015). China's leftover women: Late marriage among professional women and its
4 consequences. London: Routledge.
5
6
7 Tsang, E. Y. (2017a). Neither “bad” nor “dirty”: High-end sex work and intimate
8 relationships in urban China. China Quarterly, 230, 444-463. doi:
9 10.1017/S0305741017000649
10
11 Tsang, E. Y. (2017b). Finding hope as a “tempting Girl” in China: Sex work, indentured
12 mobility, and cosmopolitan individuals. Deviant Behavior. Advanced online
13 publication. doi: 10.1080/01639625.2017.1335543
14
15
16 Tsang, E. Y., & Lee, P. K. (2013). Vanguard of guanxi (connections) seeking, laggard in 17 promoting social causes: The Chinese new middle class and green NGOs in south
18 China? China: An International Journal, 11(2), 155-169.
19
20
21 Tsang, S. Y. (2004). A modern history of Hong Kong. London; New York: I.B. Tauris.
22
23
24 Tu, J. W., & Lee, T. T. (2014). The effects of media usage and interpersonal contacts on 25 the stereotyping of lesbians and gay men in China. Journal of Homosexuality, 26 61(7), 980–1002. doi: 10.1080/00918369.2014.871904
27
28
29 Tucker, J., Ren, X., & Sapio, F. (2010). Incarcerated sex workers and HIV prevention in 30 China: Social suffering and social justice countermeasures. Social Science &
31 Medicine, 70(1), 121-129. doi: 10.1016/j.socscimed.2009.10.010
32
33
34 United Nations, Department of Economic and Social Affairs Population Division, 35 Fertility and Family Planning Section. World Marriage Data (2012). Retrieved from 36 [http://www.un.org/en/development/desa/population/publications/dataset/marriage/
37 wmd2012.shtm](http://www.un.org/en/development/desa/population/publications/dataset/marriage/wmd2012.shtm)
38
39
40 Uretsky, E. (2008). “Mobile men with money”: The socio-cultural and politico-economic 41 context of “high-risk” behaviour among wealthy businessmen and government
42 officials in urban China. Culture, Health & Sexuality, 10(8), 801-804. doi:
43 10.1080/13691050802380966
44
45
46 Uretsky, E. (2016). Occupational hazards: Sex, business, and HIV in post-Mao China.
47 Stanford, CA.: Stanford University Press.
48
49
50 Wang, Q. (2015). Shen fen yin ni, zu qun fen hua yu tong xing lian yun dong [Identity
51 concealment, community differentiation, and homosexual movement]. Journal of 52 Jishou University (Social Science Edition), 36(2), 110-115.
53
54
55 Wang, X. (2017). Gender, Dating and Violence in Urban China. London: Routledge.
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Wang, X., & Ho, P. S. Y. (2011). "Female virginity complex" untied: Young Chinese 4 women's experience of virginity loss and sexual coercion. Smith College Studies in
5 Social Work, 81(2-3), 184-200. doi: 10.1080/00377317.2011.589336
6
7
8 Wang, Y. (2015). Cooperative marriage, a "fake marriage" or a new intimate alliance?
9 (MPhil dissertation). University of Hong Kong, Pokfulam, Hong Kong SAR.
10 Retrieved from doi: 10.5353/th_b5388024
11
12
13 Wen, H., Hao, S., & Hong, W. (2013). Nv xing gong zu ozhe de jia ting, hun yin zhuang
14 kuang ji xin li zhuang tai yan jiu [Female sex workers' family, marriage and 15 psychological status]. The Chinese Journal of Human Sexuality, 22(5), 88-92.
16
17
18 Womack, B. (2017). Xi Jinping and continuing political reform in China. Journal of 19 Chinese Political Science, 22(3), 393-406. doi: 10.1007/s11366-017-9486-7 20
21
22 Wong, D. (2006). Beyond identity politics: The making of an oral history of Hong Kong
23 women who love women. Journal of Lesbian Studies, 10(3-4), 29-48. doi:
24 10.1300/J155v10n03_03
25
26
27 Wong, D. (2015). Sexual minorities in China. In J. D. Wright (Ed.), International 28 encyclopedia of social and behavioal sciences (2nd ed.) (pp. 734-739).
29 Amsterdam: Elsevier.
30
31
32 Wong, D. (2016). Sexology and the making of sexual subjects in contemporary China.
33 Journal of Sociology, 52(1), 68-82. doi: 10.1177/1440783315587799
34
35
36 Wong, W. C., Holroyd, E., & Bingham, A. (2011). Stigma and sex work from the 37 perspective of female sex workers in Hong Kong. Sociology of Health & Illness, 38 33(1), 50-65. doi: 10.1111/j.1467-9566.2010.01276.x
39
40
41 Wong, W. C., Yim, Y. L., & Lynn, H. (2010). Sexually transmitted infections among 42 female sex workers in Hong Kong: The role of migration status. Journal of Travel
43 Medicine, 18(1), 1-7.
44
45
46 Wu, S. (2014). The revival of Confucianism and the CCP's struggle for cultural 47 leadership: A content analysis of the People's Daily, 2000-2009, Journal of 48 Contemporary China, 23(89), 971-991.
49
50
51 Xiao, S. (2011). The "second-wife" phenomenon and the relational construction of class-
52 coded masculinities in contemporary China. Men and Masculinities, 14(5), 607-
53 627. doi: 10.1177/1097184X11412171
54
55
56 Xie, K. (in press) Premarital abortion, what is the harm? The responsabilisation of 57 women's pregnancy among China's "privileged" daughters. Journal of the British 58 Association of Chinese Studies.
59
60

- 1
2
3 Xu, G., & Feiner, S. (2007). Meinü Jingji / China's beauty economy: Buying looks,
4 shifting value, and changing place. Feminist Economics, 13(3-4), 307-323. doi:
5 10.1080/13545700701439499
6
7
8 Xu, S. (2017). Cultivating national identity with traditional culture: China's experiences
9 and paradoxes. Discourse: Studies in the Cultural Politics of Education. Advanced 10 online publication. doi: 10.1080/01596306.2017.1302410
11
12 Yan, Y. (2003). Private life under socialism: Love, intimacy, and family change in a 13 Chinese village, 1949-1999. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press.
14
15
16 Yang, J. (2011). Nennu and shunu: gender, body politics, and the beauty economy in 17 China. Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society, 36(2), 333-357. doi:
18 10.1086/655913.
19
20
21 Yang, M. M. (2002). The resilience of guanxi and its new deployments: A critique of 22 some Nnw guanxi scholarship. The China Quarterly, 170: 459-476.
23
24
25 Yang, R. (2010). Soft power and higher education: An examination of China's Confucius
26 Institutes. Globalization, Societies and Education, 8(2), 235-245.
27
28 Yang, W. (2014, October 29). Sexologist punished for swindling research funds. China
29 Daily. Retrieved from http://www.chinadaily.com.cn/china/2014-
30 10/29/content_18818940.htm
31
32
33 Yau, C (2010). Dreaming of normal while sleeping with impossible: Introduction. In C.
34 Yau (Ed.), As normal as possible: Negotiating sexuality and gender in mainland
35 China and Hong Kong (pp.1-14) . Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press.
36
37
38 Yuen, S. (2015). Friend or foe? The diminishing space of China's civil society. China
39 Perspectives, 3, 51-56.
40
41
42 Yuen, W. W., Wong, W. C., Holroyd, E., & Tang, C. S. (2014). Resilience in work-
43 related stress among female sex workers in Hong Kong. Qualitative Health
44 Research, 24(9), 1232-1241. doi: 10.1177/1049732314544968
45
46
47 Zarafonitis, N. (2017). Sexuality in a changing China: Young women, sex and intimate
48 relations in the reform period. London: Routledge.
49
50
51 Zeng, J. (2016). Zhong guo nu quan: Gong min zhi shi fen zi de dan sheng [Feminism and 52 Genesis of the Citizen Intelligentsia in China]. Hong Kong: City University of 53 Hong Kong Press.
54
55
56 Zeng, J. (2016, January 17). Hei! Jin wan ji xu qu xing jiao [Hey! Let's continue having 57 sex tonight]. Retrieved from <https://theinitium.com/article/20160107-opinion-sex/>.

- 1
2
3 Zhai, M. (2013). Cong “dao zhi” zou xiang “shui zhi”—cong she hui gong zuo jiao du tan
4 nv xing gong zuo zhe she hui guan li de chuang xin [From “knife” to “water”—
5 innovative social management of female sex workers from a social work
6 perspective]. Journal of Yanan University (Social Science), 35(4), 56-60.
7
8
9 Zhang, C., Hong, Y., Li, X., Qiao, S., Zhou, Y., & Su, S. (2015). Psychological stressors
10 in the context of commercial sex among female sex workers in China. Health Care
11 for Women International, 36(7), 753-767. doi: 10.1080/07399332.2013.838247 12
13
14 Zhang, E. (2015). The impotence epidemic: Men's medicine and sexual desire in 15 contemporary China. Durham: Duke University Press.
16
17
18 Zhang, X. (2011). Men, masculinities and power in contemporary China: Reflections on 19 the phenomenon of bao ernai?. In A. Jonasdottir, V. Bryson, & K. Jones (Eds.),
20 Sexuality, gender and power: Intersectional and transnational perspectives (pp.
21 142-157). New York; London: Routledge.
22
23
24 Zhang, Y. (2016). Practising and displaying xiao—young mothers’ negotiations of 25 obligations to elders. The Journal of Chinese Sociology, 3(1), 27. doi:
26 10.1186/s40711-016-0047-9
27
28
29 Zheng, T. (2006). Cool masculinity: Male clients’ sex consumption and business alliance
30 in urban China’s sex industry. Journal of Contemporary China, 15(46), 161-182.
31 doi: 10.1080/10670560500331815
32
33
34 Zheng, T. (2007). Performing media constructed images for first-class citizenship:
35 Political struggle of rural migrant hostesses in Dalian. Critical Asian Studies, 39(1), 36 89-120. doi: 10.1080/14672710601171749
37
38
39 Zheng, T. (2009). Red lights: The lives of sex workers in postsocialist China.
40 Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
41
42
43 Zheng, T. (2011). Sex work and the state in contemporary China. In S. Dewey & P. Kelly
44 (Eds.), Policing pleasure: Sex work, policy, and the state in global perspective (pp.
45 45-58). New York and London: New York University Press.
46
47
48 Zheng, T. (2012). Female subjugation and political resistance: from literati to 49 entrepreneurial masculinity in the globalizing era of postsocialist China. Gender,
50 Place & Culture, 19(5): 652-669. doi: 10.1080/0966369X.2011.649354
51
52
53 Zheng, T. (2015). Tongzhi living: Men attracted to men in postsocialist China.
54 Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
55
56
57 Zhong, X., & Ho, P. S. Y. (2014) Xie Shang Shi Qin Mi Guan Xi: Zhong Guo Du Sheng
58 Zi Nü Fu Mu Dui Jia Ting Guan Xi He Xiao Dao De Qi Dai [Negotiable intimacy:
59
60

1
2
3 Expectations of family relationship and filial piety among only-child parents]. Open
4 Times, 1, 155-175.
5

6
7 Zhong, X., & Li, B. (2017). New intergenerational contracts in the making? The 8 experience of urban China. Journal of Asian Public Policy, 10(2), 167-182. doi:
9 10.1080/17516234.2017.1290864
10

11
12 Zhu, J., (2010). Mothering expectant mothers: Consumption, production, and two 13 motherhoods in contemporary China. Ethos, 38(4), 406-412. doi: 10.1111/j.1548-
14 1352.2010.01158.x
15

16
17 Zurndorfer, H. (2016). Men, women, money, and morality: The development of China's 18 sexual economy. Feminist Economics, 22(2), 1-23. doi:
19 10.1080/13545701.2015.1026834
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57