

UNIVERSITY OF LEEDS

This is a repository copy of Lived realities of local community: Evidence from a qualitative case study in Leeds.

White Rose Research Online URL for this paper:
<http://eprints.whiterose.ac.uk/82402/>

---

Article:

Wright, KJ (2015) Lived realities of local community: Evidence from a qualitative case study in Leeds. Social Policy and Society, 14 (4). pp. 555-568. ISSN 1474-7464

<https://doi.org/10.1017/S147474641400061X>

---

Reuse

Unless indicated otherwise, fulltext items are protected by copyright with all rights reserved. The copyright exception in section 29 of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 allows the making of a single copy solely for the purpose of non-commercial research or private study within the limits of fair dealing. The publisher or other rights-holder may allow further reproduction and re-use of this version - refer to the White Rose Research Online record for this item. Where records identify the publisher as the copyright holder, users can verify any specific terms of use on the publisher's website.

Takedown

If you consider content in White Rose Research Online to be in breach of UK law, please notify us by emailing eprints@whiterose.ac.uk including the URL of the record and the reason for the withdrawal request.

eprints@whiterose.ac.uk
<https://eprints.whiterose.ac.uk/>

Lived realities of local community: Evidence from a qualitative case study in Leeds

Word length: 5167

Dr Katy Wright

Postdoctoral Research Fellow

Bauman Institute

School of Sociology & Social Policy

University of Leeds

Woodhouse Lane

Leeds LS2 9JT

Email: k.j.wright@leeds.ac.uk

Abstract

This article draws on case study research of a low-income neighbourhood in Leeds to explore experiences of and attitudes towards place-based community. Through tracing social relations in the neighbourhood over time, from the early twentieth century to the present day, the ways in which community is embedded in everyday activities and social interactions, and the social impact of socioeconomic change on local neighbourhoods, is demonstrated. It is argued that the relentless and nostalgic focus on local communities as an idealised form of social solidarity has meant that the reasons why place based community has declined over time have been overlooked. The article challenges the assumption that social fragmentation on neighbourhood levels necessarily indicates antisocial trends or a lack of a sense of duty towards others, and draws attention to the constraints people face in developing relationships with others. Questions are raised about the viability of top-down attempts to shape social relations in particular ways.

Keywords

Community; neighbourhood; participation; relationships; place

Introduction

Much attention continues to be focused on local neighbourhoods as centres of social solidarity. Place-based communities are understood to facilitate mechanisms of mutual aid and self-sufficiency which underpin a range of policy aims, including resilience, sustainability and increased civic engagement (Morris & Gilchrist, 2011; Wilding, 2011; Peeters, 2013), whilst the absence of local interactions and familiarity with one's neighbours is understood to limit access to social capital (Lindsay, 2010), and to increase vulnerability, loneliness, and reliance on service provision (Victor et al., 2005; Heylen, 2010; Windle, et al. 2011). As a result, considerable energy is devoted to (re)discovering community spirit and building 'connected communities' through numerous top down initiatives. However, attempts to shape community in particular ways frequently overlook how patterns of social engagement are embedded in the everyday interactions that constitute people's social worlds, and how and why experiences and meanings of community vary (Creasy et al., 2008). Furthermore, the relentless focus on the "warmly persuasive" (Williams, 1983: 76) nostalgic view of community which suffuses contemporary policy and practice has meant that its 'downsides' (Portes, 1998) and the tensions and divisions that exist within neighbourhoods (Wallace, 2007: 2010) tend to be ignored. Such issues have implications for the idealisation of a particular form of social solidarity as a mould into which all 'functional' social relations should fit, and suggest a need to better understand how local patterns of social relations are shaped and experienced.

This article draws on case study research carried out in a low-income neighbourhood in Leeds – anonymised as 'North Woods' – to trace the influence of patterns of work, leisure and housing on patterns of local social engagement over time, and to explore participants' understandings and experiences of community. It is argued that changes in the broader contexts within which communities are situated, and in the conditions within which people live, can lead to social ‘disorganisation’ within local neighbourhoods, through the undermining of both the “relations of similarity” and “relations of contiguity” which underpin community (Maxwell, 2010: 53). The intention is to demonstrate how people make and ‘do’ community in particular contexts and why contemporary communities often are not centred upon particular places, and to challenge the idea that an apparent decline in place-based community necessarily indicates a trend towards “antisocial individualism” (Mooney, 2010: 2) or a lack of a sense of duty and responsibility towards others. Section one provides background on the research project and some key statistics about the case study area; section two provides a summary of the historical context of the local neighbourhood; and section three focuses on participants’ understandings and experiences of community and social engagement in the present day.

1. Background to the research and case study area

The research project on which this article is based explored the different ways in which people participated – or not – in their local neighbourhood, including both formal and informal modes of engagement. Issues around community, belonging and the informal relationships and encounters which occurred between local residents emerged as key themes from the research: not only in how they shaped people’s civic engagement and involvement with local organisations, but also in terms of the light these themes threw onto contemporary policy and theory about community. The research used in-depth narrative interviews with 17 local residents and five local stakeholders<sup>i</sup>, alongside ethnographic research of key local events, activities and organisations and desk research into the social and economic history of the local area. The interviews explored experiences of formal and informal modes of participation, and perceptions of the non/participation of others. Participants were asked about their relationships with other local residents, and the informal support mechanisms in which they were involved, as well as their sense of belonging to the local community. Within the research, efforts were made to distinguish between ‘neighbourhood’ and ‘community’, employing the idea of “neighbourhood-as-space” (Meegan & Mitchell, 2001: 2175).

Community was defined in terms of both relationships and interactions and ‘imagined’ dimensions (Anderson, 1983; Hoggett, 1997).

The case study neighbourhood is located on the outskirts of an inner city ‘wedge’, a few miles from Leeds city centre. The area is relatively small and comprised of four Super Output Areas (SOAs), including around 3,200 properties with a total population of 7,828 (ACORN, 2009: 2). The majority of the area is comprised of a social housing estate built in the early twentieth century, but the formal boundaries also include a number of private tenanted streets surrounding the estate. There are roughly equal proportions of owner occupiers (46 per cent) and social housing tenants living in the area (45 per cent), and a small number of private tenants (ACORN, 2009: 12). The area has a limited amount of shops, a primary school, a children’s centre, community centre, and a YMCA, as well a Working Men’s Club and two churches. A large majority, 95 per cent of local residents, are from a White British ethnic background, with relatively lower proportions of ethnic minority residents than in Leeds as a whole (ACORN, 2009: 10). The ACORN (2009: 2) category profile shows that 65 per cent of local residents experience relative disadvantage, and are classed as ‘hard pressed’, with high numbers of ‘struggling families’ and ‘burdened singles’. There are fairly high numbers of disadvantaged older people living in the area, and 21 per cent of local residents are classed as “post-industrial pensioners with a limiting long term illness”. However, within the area 12 per cent are classed as ‘secure families’ and 28 per cent of local residents are classified as ‘comfortably off’. One of the four SOAs (Area A) which make up the case study area is ranked in the most deprived 10 per cent in the country for the Index of Multiple Deprivation, including being in the most deprived 3 per cent for both crime and living environment deprivation, and the bottom 10 per cent for income deprivation affecting children; education, skills and training deprivation; and health deprivation and disability. Another (Area B) is in the 3 per cent most deprived for living environment deprivation, and the lowest 10 per cent for crime, whilst the other two areas have no scores in the lowest 3 per cent or 10 per cent.

2. Tracing social engagement over time

2.1 Early years

The majority of the houses on the North Woods estate were built during the 1920s and 30s to house tenants from local slum clearances in nearby North Ville. From its beginnings, the North Woods area included both privately owned and social housing, including private streets surrounding the social housing estate, and some privately owned houses within the estate itself. Anne, a resident since the late 1930s, recalled the process of slum clearance and spoke of how her family and others had “come up here to get a better life” from the back-to-back terraces in North Ville. The majority of local residents in paid work worked in key local workplaces, particularly the local forge, as well as tailors, mills and the local quarry.

Concerns about community cohesion were seemingly present from the early days of council housing provision, due to the fact that slum clearances frequently disrupted existing networks of mutual support and sociality (Ravetz, 2001). Alongside people’s dislocation from familiar areas this often led to an absence of trust and an increased tendency for people to “keep themselves to themselves” (Willmott & Young, 1957: 122). In contrast, participants recalled North Woods being like “one big family”, with many of the new residents sharing friendship and kinship networks within the neighbourhood. Many had moved from streets close by the new estate, but also had a sense of solidarity derived from shared work and leisure activities and a similarity of economic status, which often provided “the glue which affected how communities functioned” (Jones & Murie, 2006: 138).

The regular rhythms of both domestic and paid labour, such as weekly wash days and pay days, seem to have meant that the timetables of local residents tended to be fairly well synchronised, and that social encounters and interactions were relatively predictable. For example, Barry talks about the men meeting in the pub, and Anne and Eileen about the women meeting out shopping:

...there used to be a pub called the Wood Green. And we all used to go in there when we'd finished work, especially on a Friday when we got paid (Barry)

When the women came to do their shopping, they all stood and talked, and everybody would discuss things with them. It'd be, "Oh, and have you heard so-and-so and so-and-so?"

"Right, we'll put a stop to that." (Eileen)

Informal networks of information sharing – or 'gossip' – facilitated informal modes of social control amongst residents, which sometimes involved verbal or physical intimidation:

If there were people burgling houses and stuff, and you found out who it were – especially if they broke into pensioners' and stuff – certain people would go round and give them a good hiding. Whether they broke their legs or not...or what. But they got told, "Keep out of people's property" (Barry)

Information sharing also enabled mutual aid; for example, Barry told the story of when the local men from the pub had clubbed together to buy and deliver a food hamper to an older resident who had been burgled.

Numerous opportunities for social engagement were available within the local neighbourhood, including various local leisure activities organised by organisations like the tenants' association and local church. Anne and Eileen discussed their memories of estate carnivals in which they were involved, including Anne's role as 'Miss North Woods' during the early 1950s. Such provision can to some extent be seen as evidence of the perceived need to develop ‘community spirit’ amongst the residents of the new council estates to allay concerns about social fragmentation (Ravetz, 2001). But participants also recalled examples of residents organising collective activities amongst themselves, for example Dorothy talked about communal bonfire celebrations on her street:

We used to have communal bonfires across the road. It was because we couldn't afford a whole evening's worth of fireworks, and so we thought "We'll all get together," so that's what we used to do.

Similarly, Barry spoke about the numerous events and activities which took place at the local pub, including rugby matches, the local ‘pigeon section’ (a racing pigeon club), and pool tournaments. Other events happened through the local church, such as garden parties and coffee mornings, and the church was described as a kind of ‘social hub’. Shared activities were in part facilitated by the availability of women organisers who were not in paid work, and again underpinned by commonalities in economic circumstance and shared interests. Many of the activities discussed by participants were intergenerational, although there were some clear divisions in terms of gender.

Whilst participants’ recollections tend towards nostalgia for the past, of course the close-knit nature of the neighbourhood is of course unlikely to have simply created a world of cosy social relations, and there is no intention here to perpetuate the myth of “proletarian bonhomie in the face of hardship” (Wallace, 2010:57). It is likely that frictions, tensions and conflict will have existed amongst neighbours, and some of the more oppressive dimensions of close-knit communities are hinted at in Barry’s account of the physical intimidation of wrong-doers. What is demonstrated is the presence of the kinds of “frequent and intense interaction” (Bauman, 2001:48) which historically underpinned the experience and meaning of community in the case study area. The solidarities and mutual support mechanisms described emerged to some extent from necessity and a sense of interdependency and commonality amongst local residents, and resonate with accounts of similar neighbourhoods (e.g. see Wilmott & Young, 1957; Damer, 1989; Bott, 2003; Lupton, 2003). However, the shared experiences upon which the local community was built were eroded during the late twentieth century through changes in work and housing, and a general ‘emptying out’ of the neighbourhood.

2.2 Later years

During the latter half of the twentieth century, against a background of deindustrialisation, the local workplaces in which many North Woods residents were employed closed down or relocated. The forge finally closed in 2003, although the workforce diminished steadily for many years before this:

When I first became a councillor [in 1979], a lot of people were still working at the forge, and they were earning reasonable money. So the estate had a lot of skilled...working class, really. Obviously, it was the Thatcher years when unemployment began to rise... the Forge was declining, and in fact there was a general industrial decline in the area. And people are quite bitter about the Forge closing, still, because they lost their jobs and because it sort of dribbled out at the end. There wasn't a good settlement for people either, because the firm had gone bust by the time it sold out. (Peter)

Changes in the availability of local work through the decline of dominant local industries, and the imposition of redundancy on large numbers of residents of particular neighbourhoods, had social as well as economic effects, “leaving members without the support and stability essential to communal life” (Adam, 1998:20). Often, former industrial workers made redundant during this period found it difficult to find alternative employment “or dropped out of the labour market altogether” (Turner, 2003: 41). Figures suggest that this has perhaps been the case for some in the North Woods area, in which both men and women are more likely to be long-term unemployed but less likely to have never worked than in Leeds as a whole, and where there are proportionally higher rates of Job Seekers Allowance claimants aged 50+ than elsewhere. Not only was alternative employment generally located outside of the North Woods area, but it also tended to be situated within the growing service sector, for example “part-time call centre work and that sort of thing” (Paul).

In North Woods, as in other areas (e.g. see Lupton, 2003), a number of social problems resulted from these processes of socioeconomic change. Several of the participants talked about “trouble” starting during the 1980s, reaching a peak during the 1990s:

...you got people starting breaking into houses and burgling, pinching cars – joyriders - and then you got a lot of people walking round the estate, doing drugs and selling drugs on the estate. It’s altered the estate a lot has all that (Barry)

Former children’s outreach worker, Carol, recalled the sorts of problems she encountered in her work, including “domestic violence, alcohol, unemployment, [and] poor housing”, and during this period the estate became unpopular as a place to live and developed a stigmatised reputation. Many of the key local sites for social interaction and collective leisure, including some local shops and the dancehall, disappeared, with the pub being closed down due to criminal activity and eventually burned down in an arson attack. This process of ‘emptying out’ of the neighbourhood, paralleled by a withdrawal of key services such as housing from the local area, left fewer opportunities for people to develop relationships with other local residents. There was a clear perception amongst those who recalled this period that the neighbourhood had been abandoned, and that “no-one gave a shit” (Paul).

During this period of decline, local residents drew on their traditions of mutual aid and informal support to try to address some of the issues they faced. In the 1990s, a community association was established by a group of long-term residents which played a key role in addressing many of the problems which had emerged in the neighbourhood. Peter suggested that the community association could be seen as a formalisation of the informal activities which already took place, as “it’s what they were used to...looking after the old people and that sort of thing”. Participants also noted that many of those involved with establishing the community association had acted as foremen in local factories, giving them an authority which enabled them to fill leadership roles, whilst others brought specific skills and knowledge acquired through work, as Anne suggests:

They wanted a treasurer, and I said “Go on then, I’ll do it”, seeing as I’d been used to handling money at work. And ever since then, I’ve been treasurer for the association

Indeed, throughout the research the close links between the social context of the neighbourhood and the manifestations of formal engagement across a range of participatory contexts, particularly in relation to the community association, were emphasised.

Whilst the association achieved many improvements in the case study area, the dramatic changes imposed on the neighbourhood had an enduring impact on the local community, and on the social structures which had rested upon established patterns of paid work, domestic labour and leisure activities. As the following section will discuss, whilst for the most part participants reported positive experiences of living in the neighbourhood at the time of the research, social interactions amongst residents were frequently limited to a particular street or group of houses, and a small number of people suggested that they almost never encountered or spoke to other residents. Changes in the patterns and geographies of the daily lives of local residents resulting from broader processes of change had diminished the potential for social engagement within the local neighbourhood, whilst the stigmatised reputation of the neighbourhood impacted upon local residents' inclination to engage with their neighbours. At the same time, a lack of a sense of local community was not necessarily perceived negatively, and it was clear that for some participants the idea of place-based community was either irrelevant or undesirable. Alternative mechanisms and traditions of support had emerged amongst different groups living in the area, which reflected their particular experiences, needs and relationships.

3. Meanings and experiences of community in the present day

In contrast to historical accounts of shared work and leisure, none of the research participants reported working with anyone else from the local neighbourhood, and most travelled to work in other areas of Leeds or beyond. The neighbourhood was described as a “dormitory estate” (Peter) and people also tended to travel to other areas to socialise with friends, to go shopping, or for leisure activities. The continued ‘emptiness’ of the area was referred to by most participants, particularly in relation to activities for young people. Chris explained that, as he worked outside of the local area, he tended to shop at the supermarket which was located on his route home from work and rarely had cause to use the limited facilities available locally:

...it's just convenient, going to Morrison's on the way home. I do use the [local] Co-op, but...you know, whereas somewhere like Far Town has grocers, and farmer's markets, and those kinds of things that draw people in...there isn't that here

Joanne spoke about travelling to another area of Leeds for Tango lessons, whilst Simon was a member of a golf club in a neighbouring suburb. For less affluent participants, a lack of options in the local area often meant that they or their children were unable to pursue their interest in a particular sport or hobby due to the cost of travel to other areas. Few communal leisure activities were organised informally by local residents, and the main providers of leisure activities were local organisations such as the school, the older people's group and the community centre. Most of these organisations tended to focus their activities upon a particular section of the population, with the remit generally defined in terms of age or, for example, parenthood. Even when this was not the case it was often still perceived to be: for example although the community association was intended to be for everyone, activities such as Bingo and coach trips were perceived to be dominated by and most relevant to older people, particularly older women.

Whilst for some participants a lack of interactions with other local residents was primarily circumstantial, some spoke about their strategies or motivations for actively avoiding engagement, often prompted by the stigmatised reputation of the neighbourhood. For example Stuart stated that:

I keep myself to myself, and I don't mix with people round here. I don't mix with them or take shit off them, you know? I just want to bring up my kids and...get on with it, yeah?

To some extent, this was related to disagreements Stuart had experienced with his close neighbours, although he also stated that “there's no-one I want to know around here” and all of his friends lived elsewhere. Joanne, Gita and Simon each spoke about how they decided not to send their children to the local primary school because they had concerns about them falling in with the “wrong crowd” or, in Joanne's case, due to concerns about her son experiencing racism. Joanne admitted that, as a result, her son has limited options for leisure activities and socialising in the local area, however, clearly such disadvantages must be weighed against the advantages of avoiding potentially negative experiences. North Woods was clearly associated to a large extent with social housing tenants, who were implicitly associated with “problems” or “trouble” and several participants suggested that – as their experiences of living in the neighbourhood were positive - their street was perhaps not “typical” of the local area. Interestingly, those who felt their experiences were atypical included social housing tenants, private tenants and homeowners. This is of course characteristic of ways in which people seek to distance themselves – “I am not one of them” (Wacquant 1999: 1644) – from stigmatised or problem identities. For a small number of – primarily younger – participants, there was a general desire to avoid the constraints of community membership. For example, Joanne suggested that:

In a way, it's kind of that I deliberately try to keep myself slightly separate from communities, because I don't want my own lifestyle and everything else to be judged by people. It's just easier to be a bit more separate

Similarly, Mike stated that he preferred to live away from his father as “he'd know every move I'd make!”. These kinds of ambivalence or antipathy towards community membership demonstrate some of the difficulties in developing community within neighbourhood contexts.

The idea of place-based community sometimes lacked resonance with participants' personal histories, particularly those with private tenancies who tended to expect to move on and as such found that it was “difficult to get a community feeling” (Mike). An increased transiency amongst the local population was sometimes viewed negatively and seen to further undermine a sense of local community. As might be expected, those who had moved to the area from elsewhere tended to have friendship and kinship networks which were geographically dispersed. As a consequence, their mechanisms of support often took place across relatively long distances, for example Joanne spoke about how her childcare arrangements during the school holidays would involve family in Essex and Sheffield, as well as friends in different parts of Leeds. Whilst for Joanne these arrangements appeared relatively unproblematic, Eileen expressed concern that her granddaughter had been unable to acquire a house in the area after having a baby, meaning that she would lack local family support:

...there were five generations up here, and she couldn't get a house. And you need your family around you, don't you? Well...I don't mean to live with you, but you need them there to help you out.

Hence, there were clear differences in expectations about the extent to which support networks should or might be centred on particular places. It is likely that certain groups – such as older people and the less affluent – are most likely to rely on others living locally (Forrest & Kearns, 2001).

Sometimes, existing networks of family and friends amongst local residents were seen to exclude outsiders and newcomers, which often included relatively long-term residents. For example Sarah, who had lived in the area for over a decade, suggested that although she liked living in the area she had “always felt like an outsider looking in”, and this perception was echoed by Mary who had lived in the neighbourhood for 25 years:

To a certain extent I do feel like a member of the North Woods community. I may not feel it like other people on the estate do, because as you well know, a lot of this estate is made up of families. So... I feel slightly outside that, because I wasn't born and brought up on the estate and I don't know everyone. I can feel like a newcomer, sometimes, even after all this time.

Stuart, a much more recently arrived resident, suggested that he felt some degree of powerlessness as a result of his outsider status, particularly when it came to dealing with disagreements and conflict with his neighbours. He referred to the presence on his street of “families that have been in the area for generations”, and his lack of knowledge of who was related to whom, meaning that “you don't know who you're getting into a fight with”. Such concerns highlight the importance of engaging with power relations within communities, which remains a relatively unproblematised issue in much policy and practice (Pearce, 2013). But further, these accounts again highlight the importance of shared histories and experiences in shaping communities, and how these processes might take different forms at particular times and in particular places. In the case study area, traditions of long-term residency and intergenerational family presence were taken – and experienced – as indicative of the entry requirements governing local community membership, excluding those who did not share these traditions. However, changes in processes of social housing allocation, amongst other factors, had diminished the likelihood of such traditions being continued.

Despite some degree of fragmentation, it was clear that within the neighbourhood there remained vestiges of traditional modes of mutual aid and support amongst existing networks. For example, Ian told the story of how local people had responded to the death of his neighbour:

I remember when my neighbour died a year ago everyone got involved, and supported his family. I've never known that, because I've never lived on an estate before. People were giving support and...some people had donated some money towards the cost of the funeral. And loads of people they knew from years ago managed to come together and...forgive and forget, just for that one thing

Other participants spoke about their involvement in exchanges of more detached 'neighbourly' support, involving activities such as property maintenance and looking after pets during holidays. These tended to be spatially limited to a particular street or group of houses, and often did not develop into closer friendships or more extensive modes of support:

I don't think in all the years I've been here I've been in my next door neighbour Mark's house more than about four or five times. But when he went in the hospital and came out I used to go every Saturday and do his lawn and things. Maybe sometimes once or twice during the summer, we might have a barbecue and then everyone will come around. You don't get people coming in, "Oh, I've come for a chat" or... it's not like that here. (Marcus)

Overall, there was a sense that mechanisms of informal support tended to be limited to particular sections of the neighbourhood, rather than being as widespread as in the past.
However, the kinds of neighbourly activities which characterised the contemporary social context were still highly valued by participants, and contributed to their enjoyment of living in the neighbourhood.

Changes in patterns of support and social engagement amongst local residents were also reflected in shifts in patterns of formal participation, such as volunteering, which had in turn affected the community association. At the time of research, it had experienced a significant decline in membership, and several participants expressed concerns about its future. In Anne's words "people have died, people have left the vicinity...people have dwindled away", and few had come forward to take over from or support the original volunteers, who were now mostly in their seventies. A lack of engagement amongst other residents tended to be interpreted by the more active residents as demonstrating a lack of “commitment to the community”, or showing that “people don’t like doing anything for nothing”. However, the evidence demonstrated that often people were engaged in voluntary work in other geographical areas. For example Gita volunteered at a Sikh temple in a different neighbourhood of Leeds, and Chris had done voluntary work arranged through his church in South Town, a disadvantaged neighbourhood in Leeds. Other people spoke about being involved with other charitable organisations such as Oxfam, whilst Sarah discussed her voluntary role in putting on musical events in the city centre. Such activities demonstrated that a lack of involvement in activities in their own neighbourhood did not necessarily indicate that people were disinclined to volunteer time or lacked of a sense of duty to others, but rather that opportunities to volunteer tended to relate to participants’ existing interests, relationships and activities. As Chris stated:

In a sense it would be more logical for me to be involved in the same stuff in North Woods as it would in South Town, but...I guess it’s just because that link naturally happened through my church that I ended up being involved there

Several people were unaware of what kinds of organisations and activities there were in the neighbourhood, due to the fact that most of their activities and interactions occurred elsewhere, and hence did not know of local volunteering opportunities. Others felt that their ‘outsider’ status might mean that their involvement was not welcome, or that they would not be able to represent the views and needs of local people.

Conclusion

The aim of this article has been to demonstrate how meanings and experiences of community emerge from everyday activities and interactions, and how forms of social solidarity are shaped by the broader socioeconomic context. The analysis presented here suggests that the apparent trend towards social fragmentation on neighbourhood levels reflects the deterritorialisation of contemporary patterns of work, housing, leisure and relationships. This challenges behavioural explanations of the decline of place-based community, and highlights the constraints people experience on their capacity and inclination to develop relationships with others. In particular, key modes of stratification and inequality and the associated stigmatisation of particular groups would seem to have important effects on the forms that social solidarity takes. Furthermore, it has been suggested that attitudes towards and experiences of community membership vary amongst different groups, and that aims to rediscover or rebuild community on neighbourhood levels are not universally perceived as desirable. These issues challenge the assumption implicit in policy and practice that social networks can be purposively built to ensure individual and collective benefit, and demonstrate a need to understand and engage more fully with the ways that community is shaped by the broader context. Whilst it would seem that certain groups – such as older and poorer people - might lose out from a loss of place-based community, it might be useful to start to identify and account for new and different ways of doing and perceiving community outside of a narrow geographical conceptualisation, and to consider how to adapt policy and practice to meet the needs of these groups within this context.

<sup>1</sup> Appendix 1 provides information about the participants, who are referred to in this article by their assigned pseudonyms

Appendix 1: List of participants

Name	Age	Ethnicity	Religion	Years lived	Place of Birth	Occupation	Type of tenancy
Amy	24	White British	No religion	14 years	Leeds	Unemployed in training	Local authority tenant
Ian	25	White British	No religion	On and off for 4 years	Leeds	Unemployed never worked	Local authority tenant
Joanne	31	White British	No religion	4 years	Essex	University administrator	Private tenant
Chris	32	White British	Baptist	6.5 years	Doncaster	Clinical scientist	Private owner
Suresh	25	British Asian	Sikh	9 years	Leeds	Housewife	Private owner
Mike	36	White British	No religion	18 months	Otley	Unemployed builder	Private tenant
Sophie	37	White British	No religion	2 years	Exeter	Dog walker	Private owner
Sarah	41	White Irish	No religion	16 years	Leeds	Unemployed disability benefits	Local authority tenant
Stuart	53	White British	No religion	7 years	Corby	Cleaner	Local authority tenant
Barry	51	White British	No religion	49 years	Leeds	Publican	Local authority tenant
Simon	58	White British	Church of England	34 years	Wakefield	Retired teacher	Private owner
Judith	61	White British	Church of England	18 months	North Yorks	Vicar	Other (lives in vicarage)
Marcus	69	Black Caribbean	Church of England	34 years	Jamaica	Retired factory worker	Private owner
Eileen	73	White British	Church of England	63 years	Leeds	Retired catering and hotel trade	Local authority tenant

Anne	74	White British	Church of England	70 years	Leeds	Retired wage clerk	Private owner
Dorothy	75	White British	Church of England	30 years	Drighlington	Retired archivist	Private owner
Mary	79	White British	Church of Scot	26 years	Oban	Retired hotel trade	Local authority tenant

Aadi	Neighbourhood Management Officer for the local ALMO	Worked in area for 3 years
Carol	Family Outreach Worker	No longer works in area, was there for 2 years until 2005
Andrew	General Manager of Older People's Support Service	In this post for 10 years, previously worked at the community centre
Paul	Chair of the North Woods Community Association Member of the Board of Governors for the Local School Involved with local Children's Centre	In this post for 7 years
Peter	Local Councillor	Represented the area for 30 years

Bibliography

Adam, B. (1998). "When Time is Money: Contested rationalities of time and challenges to the theory and practice of work". Keynote paper for the Sociology of Work Group, ISA Montreal. July 1998.

Anderson, B. (1983). Imagined communities: Reflections on the origin and spread of Nationalism. London: Verso

Bauman, Z. (2000). Liquid Modernity. London: Polity Press

Bauman, Z. (2001). Community: Seeking Safety in an Insecure World. London: Wiley

Bott, E. (2003). Family & Social Network. Psychology Press: London

Creasy, S., Gavelin, K., & Potter, D. (2008). "Everybody needs good neighbours? A study of the link between public participation and community cohesion". Involve: London

Damer, S. (1989). From Moorepark to 'Wine Alley': The Rise and Fall of a Glasgow Housing Scheme. Edinburgh University Press: Edinburgh

Forrest, R. & Kearns, A. (2001). "Social Cohesion, Social Capital and the Neighbourhood". Urban Studies. 38(12): 2125-2143

Heylen, L. (2010). "The older, the lonelier? Risk factors for social loneliness in old age". Ageing & Society. 30(7): 1177-1196

Hoggett, P. (1997). Contested Communities: Experiences, Struggles, Policies. Bristol: Policy Press

Jones, C. & Murie, A. (2006). The Right to Buy: Analysis and Evaluation of a Housing Policy. Wiley: London

- Lindsay, C. (2010). "In a Lonely Place? Social Networks, Job Seeking, and the Experience of Long-Term Unemployment". Social Policy & Society. 9(1): 25-37
- Lupton, R. (2003). Poverty Street: the dynamics of neighbourhood decline and renewal. CASEbrief25. Centre for Analysis of Social Exclusion: London
- Maxwell, J. (2010). A Realist Approach for Qualitative Research. Sage: London
- Meegan, R. & Mitchell, A. (2001). "'It's not community round here, it's neighbourhood': Neighbourhood Change and Cohesion in Urban Regeneration Policies". Urban Studies. 38(12): 2167-2194
- Mooney, G. (2010). "The disadvantaged working class as 'problem' population: The Broken Society and class misrecognition". Concept. 1(3).
- Morris, D. and Gilchrist, A. (2011). Communities connected: inclusion, participation and common purpose. London: RSA
- Pearce, J. (2013). "Power in Community: A Research and Social Action Scoping Review". Connected Communities. Available online at <http://www.ahrc.ac.uk/Funding-Opportunities/Research-funding/Connected-Communities/Scoping-studies-and-reviews/Documents/Power%20in%20Community%20-%20A%20Research%20and%20Social%20Action%20Scoping%20Review.pdf>
- Peeters, R. (2013). "Responsibilisation on Government's Terms: New Welfare and the Government of Responsibility and Solidarity". Social Policy & Society. 12(4): 583-595
- Portes, A. (1998). "Social Capital: Its origins and applications in modern sociology". Annual Review of Sociology. Volume 24: 1-24.
- Ravetz, A. (2001). Council Housing and Culture: The History of a Social Experiment. Routledge: London

- Tebbutt, M. (1995). Women's Talk? A Social History of 'Gossip' in Working-Class Neighbourhoods. Scolar Press: Aldershot
- Turner, R. (2003). The British Economy in Transition: From the Old to the New?. Routledge: London
- Victor, C.R., Scambler, S.J., Bowling, A. & Bond, J. (2005). "The prevalence of, and risk factors for, loneliness in later life: a survey of older people in Great Britain. Ageing & Society. 25: 357-375.
- Wacquant, L. (1999). "Urban Marginality in the Coming Millennium". Urban Studies. 36(10): 1639-1647
- Wallace, A. (2007). "'We have had nothing for so long that we don't know what to ask for: New Deal for Communities and the Regeneration of Socially Excluded Terrain'". Social Policy & Society. 6(1): 1-12
- Wallace, A. (2010). "New neighbourhoods, new citizens? Challenging 'community' as a framework for social and moral regeneration under New Labour in the UK". International Journal of Urban and Regional Research. 34 (4): 805-819
- Wilding, N. (2011). Exploring Resilience in Times of Rapid Change. Fife: Carnegie UK Trust
- Willmott, P. & Young, M. (1957). Family & Kinship in East London. Routledge & Kegan Paul: London
- Williams, R. (1976), Keywords: A vocabulary of culture and society. Oxford University Press, New York
- Windle, K., Francis, J. & Coomber, C. (2011). "Preventing Loneliness and Social Isolation: interventions and outcomes". Social Care Institute for Excellence. Research Briefing 39.

---